While the thoughts around the leader of Fann were running through Babur's mind, he couldn't help but recall Khusrau Shah. He was also celebrated for liberality and kindness. He had given outstanding services and reception to Badi'-al-zaman Mīrzā, Baqi Tarkhān and many other begs. Many had received his generosity, but Babur never received it although he passed through his country twice (the second time, it would happen in AD 1522–23). Babur has recorded that all his peers and even the lowest of his servants had received better treatment than Babur. Perhaps, things had hurt Babur hard, and hence he penned it down:[*]

> Who, o my heart! has seen goodness from worldlings?
> Look not for goodness from him who has none.

Now that Babur was of the impression that the Aūzbegs were in Keshtud, he made sure to visit the land after passing through Fann. Babur was clear that no one was keen to occupy the place. And then he along with his troops dismounted on the banks of the Zarafshan River. From there, Babur sent a few begs under Qasim Quchin to surprise Rabat-i-Khwaja. After having accomplished that, they crossed the river by a bridge opposite Yari. They went through Yari and over the Shunqar-Khāna range into Yar Yilaq. The begs had already reached Rabat-i-Khwaja and had set up ladders to breach the fort. Unfortunately, people inside got to know about it and with not many options left, they had to retire and join Babur through Yari.
