Babur went and set their ladders up opposite the Lovers' Cave. They successfully got inside it without drawing anyone's notice and straightway approached the gate. Fazil Tarkhān was at the guard; he was brutally attacked by Babur's men. He was beheaded and none of his retainers were spared. Soon they dismantled the lock using an axe and left the gate wide open.

By then Babur had reached the spot with his remaining men. He barged inside the Turquoise Gate with full force.

Abu'l Qasim Kohbur did not make it to join Babur but had sent his forty retainers under his younger brother Ahmad-i-Qasim. Neither Ibrahim Trakhān had joined Babur. He too had sent his few retainers led by his younger brother Ahmad Tarkhān. By the time Tarkhān's retainers and his younger brother reached, Babur had already made it into the monastery of the town.

Since it was night, almost all of the town were deep asleep unaware of the major political changes that won't await even the dawn. But hearing the slow but evident ruckus, few traders peeped out of their shops. They were surprised and happiness ran deep in their hearts as they recognized Babur easily. They prayed to Allah, perhaps thanking him for having sent him. The news of Babur's arrival begun to spread like fire. People were delighted, and they fearlessly joined Babur's men in slaughtering the Aūzbegs. None of them were left alive. They were killed in every lane and alleys by the outraged public. They used clubs and stones effectively, treating the 400 to 500 Aūzbegs as no more than the mad street dog.

Jan-Wafa, the then governor, was living in Khwaja Yahya's house but realizing the contempt of the public, he decided to run away and take refuge at the feet of Shaybāni Khān.

Babur had taken a post over the arch of the Monastery. A hullabaloo of 'Down! down!' was echoing thereby making the night highly festive for Babur. On hearing the hullabaloo, some of the notable people and traders came forward to see Babur. They not only showered him with blessings but also brought good food. Dawn had kissed the land of Samarkand and so to the fate of Babur.

Babur appeared to be in absolute control but then the news came from the Iron Gate, which was not very pleasing for him. The Aūzbegs were giving a good fight there. The sleep-deprived Babur did not think twice and with a score of warriors rushed towards the Iron Gate. By the time Babur reached there, the mob of townspeople had ransacked every corner of the newly taken town for loot and had driven the Aūzbegs out thoroughly.

Babur stood vindicated.

The news reached Shaybāni Khān soon. With the sun getting higher, he rushed to the Iron Gate with around 140 trustworthy warriors. Babur was in a