Mosque. Quch Beg exchanged blows with them. Babur says that this fight was a treat to watch for the skills shown by Quch. Many on Babur's side had begun absconding and were occupied only with their escape. Perhaps, the time to shoot arrows and make a stand had gone by.

Babur was shooting with a slur bow from above the gate along with some men. This attack had kept the enemy from advancing beyond the mosque, and Shaybāni was successfully made to retire from there.

During this siege, routine rounds of ramparts were made each night which at times were also done by Qasim Beg and Babur himself. The rounds couldn't be completed entirely on horse. One could ride from the Turquoise Gate to the Shaikh-Zada's Gate, but the rest of the way had to be walked. The round was indeed a big one as when some did it entirely on foot, it wouldn't end just before dawn.

But things were not set to remain settled for long.

One very fateful day, Shaybāni Khān attacked from between the Iron Gate and the Shaikh-Zada's Gate. Given the surprising nature of his raid catching the troops unawares, Babur along with a bunch of few went ahead as the reserve. Babur's shots were going well that day through the slur bow. However, Khān's men attacked so vigorously this time that they got close under the ramparts very easily. This happened largely as even though a bunch of men along with Babur were giving a great fight, the remaining troops were not there to counter the intense vigour that Shaybāni's men had brought to the battlefield. Babur and his men were entirely off their guard on the other side of the town. There, the enemy had posted eighty good men in ambush. They had around two dozen ladders which were so wide that two or three could be mounted in a horizontal row on it at a time. Now they captured all of Babur's men near the Iron Gate, following which they quickly set up their ladders between the two gates. This was exactly the spot where a road led from the ramparts to Muhammad Mazid Tarkhān's houses. That post was controlled by Quich Beg and Muhammad Quli Quchin. Having lost their brave subordinates, they had taken refuge in Muhammad Mazid's houses.

Meanwhile, the Needle Maker's Gate was controlled by Qara (Black) Barlas. The Bleaching-Ground Gate was in control of Qutluq Khwaja Kukuldash along with Sherim Taghai and his brethren. While the other side of the town was being attacked, the men attached to these posts weren't on guard. They were at peace at their quarters or off to the bazar for necessary