The truce had to follow all conditions laid by Shaybāni which would let the things transpire as mentioned below:

At midnight, Babur and his folk departed from the town by the Shaikh-Zada's Gate. Babur took his mother Khānīm out along with two other women folks, namely: Bīshka-i-Khalīfa and Mīnglīk Kūkūldāsh. Babur's whole party included more than 200 people.

According to Babur (as said in the Baburnama), this exodus saw his elder sister, Khān-zāda Begum falling into the hands of Shaybāni Khān. But Humayun Nama by Gulbadan Begum has given us a different picture. According to her, Shaybāni had asked for a nikaah with Khān-zāda as one of the primary conditions of the truce.[*] She didn't fall in his hands; rather a proper nikkah was solemnized that too with the consent of Babur's mother.[2]

The starch darkness of the midnight made them lose their way. For long they kept wandering around the main irrigation channels of Soghd. As the dawn broke, they were able to pass Khwāja Dīdār after encountering multiple difficulties in the night. By the time of Sunnat prayer, they had made it to the rising ground of Qarā-būgh. Following the northern gradient of Qarā-būgh, they quickly hurried past the foot of Judūk village dropping down into Yīlān-aūtī.

As Babur went through these hardships, he thought of indulging in lighter moments in the tourney. Qāsim Beg, Qaṃbar-'alī and he began to race with each other. Babur's horse was leading initially but out of excitement, he looked behind to check how far his two competitors were and ended up twisting himself round. He was thrown head-on to the ground. Perhaps the girth may have slackened, leading to the turning of the saddle and hence the accident. Although Babur soon got up and remounted, his head didn't appear steady till evening. He kept feeling delirious. Soon they dismounted in Yīlān-aūtī. A horse was killed and roasted for food. They could make it to Khalīla village before dawn. Now they were on the way to Dīzak, which was controlled by Ḥāfiẓ Muhammad Dūldāī's son, ṭāhir. They were served with plenty of food which included fleshy meats, loaves of fine flour, sweet melons and abundant juicy grapes. Babur's side felt the repose of seeing the abundance after a long period of deprivation. They all ate like there was no tomorrow. To capture this emotion Babur composed the following prose in the Turkic language:[*]

> From fear and hunger rest we won;
