A fresh world’s newborn life we won.
From out our minds, death’s dread was chased;
From our men, the hunger-pang kept back.

They had never felt such relief in their lives before. Babur does acknowledge that they had never appreciated security and plentiness so much. Babur writes, ‘Joy is best and more delightful when it follows sorrow, ease after toil. I have been transported four or five times from toil to rest and from hardship to ease. This was the first. We were set free from the affliction of such a foe and the pangs of hunger and had reached the repose of security and the relief of abundance.’

They stayed in Dīzak for four days in complete peace, resting the best they could. And then they set out for Aūrā-tīpā. Babur ensured that he visited the recently-occupied Pashāghar, which was at a little detour. There they came across one of Khānīm’s old servants and a teacher. They were informed that Khūb-nigār Khānīm, Babur’s mother and Khānim’s younger sister had already bidden farewell to the transitory world leaving him in grief.

After consulting Muḥammad Ḥusayn Mīrzā, it was decided that Babur’s party would settle in a village called Dikh-kat in Aūrā-tīpā for the upcoming winter. thereafter reaching there, Babur immediately got over his impediment and set out to visit Shāh Begum, Khān Dada and other relatives. Babur spent a few days in Tashkent and waited on Shāh Begum and Khān Dada. His mother’s elder sister, Mihr-nigār Khānum had come from Samarkand too and was in Tashkent. When they visited there, Babur’s mother fell very ill and just survived a large risk.

His Highness Khwājaka Khwāja had somehow managed to get out of Samarkand and settle down in Far-kat. Babur gave a respectful visit to him. He was hoping that his Khān Dada would shower affection and kindness on him. Babur was also expecting at least a district if not a country. Eventually, he did promise to give Aūrā-tīpā to Babur but Muhammad Ḥusain Mīrzā came in the way. After spending a few days with him (in Aūrā-tīpā), Babur again returned to Dikh-kat.

Dikh-kat was a village in Aūrā-tīpā’s hill tracts below the range. On the other side of this range existed a country called Macha. It housed Turks, herdsmen and shepherds—all villagers. Babur and his companions dismounted at the houses of village peasants. Babur stayed in the house of a
