Ḥiṣār and waited on Babur. During this period, Babur had composed the following opening lines:[†]

> Let your portrait flatter you never so much, than it you are more;
> Men call you their Life than Life, without a doubt, you are more.

Meanwhile, Shaybāni Khān retired after having plundered enough in Aūrā-tīpā. While he was up there, Babur disregarded the lack of numbers of men and their scarce arms supply. They left their impedimenta in Macha and crossed the Āb-burdan pass rushing to Dikh-kat. The intention was very clear that they wanted to gather close at hand and had no desire to miss any chance. However, nothing could progress as they desired. Shaybāni had retired straightway and Babur along with his men had nothing more to do than to return to Macha helplessly.

Babur had turned highly dismayed in that period. He has written in the Baburnama, 'It passed through my mind that to wander from mountain to mountain, homeless and houseless, without country or abiding-place, had nothing to recommend it.'

And then Babur realized that there was no other way than going to the great Khān himself. 'Go you right off to the Khān.' Words echoed in his mind and conveyed the same to Qāsim Beg. But he wasn't so impressed and happy with this proposition. Perhaps he was uncomfortable because once he had killed the Moghūls at Qarā-būlāq, setting an absolute example of terror, guilt had trapped him big time. Babur tried his best, but he couldn't convince him. Finally after losing each argument, yet not changing his opinion, Babur along with a few followers crossed the Āb-burdan pass to get Khān's audience in Tashkent. On the other hand, Qāsim Beg moved forward to Ḥiṣār with all his brothers and following.

Babur Arrives to See Khān

A year ago, Taṃbal had drawn his men out and gone into the blacksmith's-dale. It was then that many men at the top of his army conspired to assassinate him. A few such men were Muhammad Dūghlāt (Ḥiṣārī), his younger brother Ḥusain, and Qaṃbar-'alī. When he discovered this weighty matter, they, unable to remain with him, had gone to Khān.
