It was the day of ‘Īd-i-qurbān on 16 June of AD 1502. Babur had presented a quatrain to Khān. He was not very well-versed with the poetic idioms and hence asserted that the creation was ordinary. He was also quite hesitant to present it to Khān for he too wrote verses, although none extraordinary. By presenting his quatrain, Babur also raised his doubts to Khān but it came to be of not much help. The verse was as under:[*]

> One hears no man recall another in trouble;
>
> None speak of a man as glad in his exile;
>
> My own heart has no joy in this exile;
>
> Called glad is no exile, man though he be.

A few days passed. Khān came to know that Taṃbal had gone into Aūrā-tīpā with his army riding out from Tashkent. He formed an array of men on the left and right between Bīsh-kīnt and Sām-sīrak and counted his men. Having known this, the standards were raised in Moghūl fashion. Babur describes it as below in the Baburnama:[*]

> The Khān dismounted and nine standards were set up in front of him. A Moghūl tied a long strip of white cloth to the thigh bone of a cow and took the other end in his hand. Three other long strips of white cloth were tied to the staves of three of the (nine) standards, just below the yak-tails, and their other ends were brought for The Khān to stand on one and for me and Sulṭān Muḥammad Khānika to stand each on one of the two others. The Moghūl who had hold of the strip of cloth fastened to the cow’s leg, then said something in Moghūl while he looked at the standards and made signs towards them. The Khān and those present sprinkled qumīz in the direction of the standards; hautbois and drums were sounded towards them; the army flung the war-cry out three times towards them, mounted, cried it again and rode at the gallop round them.

One must note that the Moghūls followed and observed the rules precisely as Genghis Khān had laid them down a couple of centuries back. A typical trait of Moghūls, each man had his place determined, as it had been held by the ancestors—right, left, left, or centre. It was practised that the most reliable men would take the extreme left and right positions. The Chīrās and Begchīk clans always demanded to take the point in the right. In that period, the Beg of the Chīrās Tūmān was one the bravest ever known. His name was Qāshka (Mole-marked) Mahmud, and Ayūb Begchīk was the renowned beg of the Begchīk Tūmān. Horrifically enough, both drew swords on one another, disputing who would take the right point. Finally, when elders
