intervened, it was concluded that both would take the very position respectively in the hunting circle and the battle-array.

The next day they made enough rounds and finally decided to go hunting near Sāmsīrak. Following this, they moved to the Tūrāk Four-Gardens. Babur seemed to have cherished this moment. On that day and in that camp, he finished his first ode. The opening couplet reads as follows:[*]

> Except my soul, no friend worth trust found I;
>
> Except my heart, no confidant found I.

The ode consisted of six couplets.

Khān had begun to march from Sām-sīrak to the bank of the Khujand River along with Babur. One very fine day, they crossed the water of Khujand like an excursion. There, they cooked food making merry with the soldiers. Babur has recalled that day as an eventful one, marked by an unfaithful occurrence—someone stole the gold clasp of his girdle.

And the next day, after the festivities, something obnoxious occurred which many had suspected from quite long. Bayān-qulī's son Khān-qulī and Sulṭān Muḥammad Wais fled to Taṃbal. At the same time, Aḥmad-i-qāsim Kohbur asked for a leave and went to Aūrā-tīpā, never to return as he too went to Taṃbal.
