Sa‘īd Khān, Bābā Khān Sultān, and his two sons who did not bother to dismount. Agitated by the two teens, Khān told them to dismount and bend the knee to (bīla) Babur to confer due respect. Getting over with a courteous welcome they all proceeded to see the most respectable Shāh Begum. The younger Khān, after having bestowed respect on her and seen his sisters, went on to banter almost the whole of the night. Indeed, they had a lot to share for whatever transpired in their lives while he was away.

Despite a long night of conversations, he woke up quite early. The morning’s audience between Babur and him was quite intimate. The younger Khān bequeathed Babur his arms and gifted him one of his very special horses. He also presented Babur with a Moghūl head-to-foot dress which included a Moghūl cap, a long coat of Chinese satin with a work of embroidery and Chinese armour. It was much older in fashion wherein on the left side a sack and an outer bag were hung. It also had a few things which women, in general, hung on their collars such as perfume-holders and various receptacles. Similarly, the right side of the armour was loaded with three or four things.

Then, they resumed the travel to Tashkent. Babur’s elder Khān Dada too had come out to welcome the younger one. He sat on the temporary awning, waiting at fifteen miles from the Tashkent. The younger Khān went up directly to him with a broad smile. He made around left to right around his elder brother and then finally dismounted in front of him. After advancing to the place of interview (kūrūshūr yīr), he bent the knee nine times. Then he saw his brother from close. The elder Khān, who smiled compassionately, rose and both looked into each other’s eyes, and then stood in a close embrace for long. The younger Khān again bent the knee nine times before retiring and offered gifts that he had got for him.

He had arrived with a party of not less than 200 men. All his men had bejewelled themselves in Moghūl fashion, sported the Moghūl caps, long coats of Chinese satin embroidered with stitchery, Moghūl quivers and saddles of green shagreen leather. Their Moghūl horses too were decorated uniquely. In Babur’s opinion, he was a man of remarkable mannerisms and a mighty brave master of the sword. The sword was indeed his most trusted arm. He often used to say that ‘of arms there are, the shash-par (six-flanged mace), the piyāzī (rugged mace), the kīstin, the tabar-zīn (saddle-hatchet) and the bāltū (battle-axe), all if they strike, work only with what of them first touches, but the sword, if it touches, works from point to hilt’.
