Taṃbal was badly broken with the return of many forts and rising revolts. Yet, Taṃbal didn't appear to bend even a bit. He sat down with an army of horsemen and foot soldiers, fortified with ditch and branch, to face the Khāns, between Karnān and Akhsī. Small skirmishes and fights became a regular feature, yet there was no clear sign of success yet.

Now, even all the tribes, hordes, forts and districts of Andijān country had joined hands with Babur. Andijānīs indeed always wished good for Babur although they could never find the right means to express their allegiance. Babur thought that if they went close to the town at night and sent a man in to discuss with the Khwāja and notables, they might perhaps have let them in somewhere. With this belief in mind, Babur rode out from Osh. They were merely a couple of miles away from Andijān around midnight. From there they sent Qaṃbar-'alī Beg forward with some other begs as per the plan to deliberate a discussion with the Khwāja. Babur was quite certain that post that discussion he would be able to get his men into the fort.

After they went, Babur, while being seated on his horse, kept waiting for their return anxiously. Few had patiently humped up, while others had descended into slumber. But soon, at about the third watch, there rose the sound of drums and yells of war cries. Unaware of the enemies' strength, sleepy and startled, Babur's men jumped into the battle without having looked at each other. There was no time for Babur to get at them and he went straight for the enemy. Mīr Shāh Qūchīn, Bābā Sher-zād, Nāṣir's Dost and Babur sprang forward, leading the fight. While Babur was steadily marching forward, the enemy rode rapidly, gave out the war cry and showered arrows like the heaviest of rain. One of the men from the foe's side came too close to Babur, whom Babur shot without wasting a moment and sending him beyond the world briskly. The enemy was turning fiercer with every passing moment and Babur's camp's momentary unpreparedness was also adding fuel to it.

The three others who were leading with Babur said, 'In this darkness, it is not certain whether they are many or few; all our men have gone off; what harm could we four do them? Fighting must be when we have overtaken our runaways and rallied them.'

They were indeed worried. Yet they had to give a fight—they were trying their best. They hurried, got up with their men, beat and horse-whipped some of the enemies but whatever they would do, they stood nowhere close
