Babur shot off the arrow. His foe, Taṃbal adjusted the attachment of his shield conveniently to counter what was coming. They shot at Babur's right leg. Taṃbal came shouting and attacked Babur on the head. The blow created a large wound on Babur's head (thought not a thread of his cap was affected), whacking him out of his senses for long. He had yet not uncovered his sword, and it was lying unused in the scabbard. He never got a chance to draw it. Babur was in a vulnerable position, surrounded by many enemies. He couldn't stand still. And then upon him came Tambal's sword again, this time on his arrows. By then his three remaining companions came in to stand for their king. After having weakened Babur completely with his sword, Taṃbal attacked Nāṣir Dost too. Things had begun to turn extremely disastrous for Babur. With no option left, Babur and his companions began to retreat. But enemies chased Babur and the other three for quite a distance.

The Khākān canal used to be a great main channel. It flowed in a deep cutting that could not be crossed everywhere. But in this instance, Babur thanked Allah, as they came exactly opposite a low place where there existed an overpass. They crossed it directly. In the process, Nāṣir Dost's horse fell, turning weak to the force. They stopped and remounted Dost and drew off for Osh, over the rising ground between Ferghana and Khirābūk. As they reached the elevated spot, Mazīd ṭaghāī came up to join them. His right leg was injured after being pierced by an arrow and could make it to Osh only after extreme difficulty. In this skirmish, Babur lost many soldiers, including Nāṣir Beg, Muḥammad 'Alī Mubashir, Khwāja Muḥammad 'Alī, Khusrau Kūkūldāsh and Na'man the page along with many unmailed warriors.

The Khāns Make a Move from Kāsān to Andijān

The Khāns had been closely following Taṃbal's trail. Hence, they dismounted near Andijān at the side of the reserve in the garden, known as Birds' Mill (Qūsh-tīgīrmān). It belonged to Babur's maternal grandmother, Aīsān-daulat Begum. Two days had passed since the Khāns had dismounted near Andijān and Babur had travelled from Osh to see the elder Khān in Birds'Mill.