pitches at an unusual place. His tent, like that of raiders, was full of melons, grapes, saddlery and every sort of thing. After meeting him, Babur returned to his own camp where he was sent a Moghūl surgeon by the younger Khān to examine the leg wound. In the Moghūl language, a surgeon was also called a bakhshī. The one who visited Babur was called Ātākā Bakhshī.

Babur showers abundant praises to this surgeon who according to him, was very skilful. He has written, 'If a man's brains had come out, he would cure it, and any sort of wound in an artery he easily healed.' The surgeon in general used to recommend a form of plaster for wounds along with some medicines.

But for Babur, he ordered a bandage (made from the skin of a fox leg) to be tied on the wound without any seton. He also made Babur consume some sort of a fibrous root. He told Babur, 'A certain man had his leg broken in the slender part and the bone was shattered for the breadth of the hand. I cut the flesh open and took the bits of bone out. Where they had been, I put a remedy in powder form. That remedy simply became bone where there had been bone before.'[*]

He kept narrating many strange stories to Babur while treating him.

Four days passed. Babur was still recovering, and Qaṃbar-'alī had not shown his face to him so far. Perhaps, he was perplexed about the last conversation he had with Babur. Babur feared that he might have fled to Taṃbal in Andijān.

Babur recovered over the next few days. The Khāns attached Ayūb Begchīk with his tūmān, Jān-ḥasan Bārīn with the Bārīn tūmān, Sārīgh-bāsh Mīrzā as the army-beg and 2000 men with Babur, instructing them to make a move to Akhsī.

Babur Moves to Akhsī

Then, Akhsī was in control of Taṃbal's younger brother, Shaikh Bāyazīd and Shahbāz Qārlūq controlled Kāsān. Shahbāz was lying before Nū-kīnt fort. He was due to cross the Khujand-water opposite Bīkhrātā. Babur and his men hurried to accost him right there. It was just a little before dawn, when Babur was almost near the place when his begs informed that Shaikh Bāyazīd perhaps knew about the plan of attack. The begs advised to not go on in a broken array. Hence Babur ensured that his men kept moving at a slower speed thereby maintaining the array. The information passed on by
