Babur had posted a party of braves in a rare, less contoured open space in the middle of Akhsī. When Babur left, a large contingent of the enemy arrived. They were full in strength, mounted on the horse and foot. They chased the men from the post and were bound to be shoved into a narrow lane. Hearing about the problem, Babur came up the lane and galloped his horse at the enemies. Babur's force was apt and massive, and he forced them to flee. But while Babur was ferociously at work, one from the enemies' camp shot his horse in the leg. It stumbled and threw Babur amid the herd of the enemy. He hurried to get up as soon as possible and began to shoot arrows again. Babur's squire Kahil came forward to help. He stepped down from his weak pony and offered Babur to mount it. Babur took the pony and cruised to the next lane to behead more enemies.

Perhaps Babur had gained abundant love from his people. Seeing him mount a weak pony, Sulṭān Muhammad Wais offered his horse. As Babur mounted the horse, Qāsim Beg's son Qaṃbar-'alī came yelling but ended up being shattered completely. He was badly wounded. They informed him that Jahāngīr Mīrzā had been attacked some time ago. He had ridden away in a state of panic along with his men.

Babur has said that they were 'thunderstruck' at that moment.

When all these ruckuses were demotivating Babur, Sayyid Qāsim, the commandant of Pāp, arrived. He was badly wounded and could neither tell the reason for his arrival, nor he could tell what wrong had happened to him. This was completely unexpected for Babur. In such a period of crisis, it was highly unwise to let the strong fort of Pāp go unattended. Babur called Ibrāhīm Beg and whispered, 'What's to be done now?' Beg's reply hasn't been documented.

Now, Babur began to germinate an idea that he would get across the bridge, destroy it, and get straight to Andijān. Babur was morally boosted by all his compatriots. Bābā Sher-zād said, 'We will storm out at the gate and get away at once.' And many others spelt the words of motivation.

They set off for the gate that very instant. Khwāja Mīr Mīrān also motivated the folks as they marched outwards.

Now, they had reached the opposite end of the gate. There appeared Shaikh Bāyazīd, dressed in his pull-over shirt above the vest, accompanied by a quadrat of horsemen. In the morning, he had been arrested by Jahāngīr's men against Babur's will but needed to be released once the
