Samarkand. His followers were beaten and plundered as well. They followed the tribesmen and took service with Babur.

And then from the camp, Babur with his strengthened party marched through the Āq-sarāī meadow of the Qarā-bāgh. Khusrau Shāh's people were well known for violent oppression. They domineered over one after another quite frequently, but things had to stop someday. Babur got one of the braves of Sayyidīm ʻAlī beaten black and blue when he forcefully tried to take a jar of oil. The blows imparted were so severe that he died immediately on the spot. In Babur's opinion, this cold-blooded murder set an example for the rest so that such a mistake is never replicated.

Babur called for a counsel in that camp to deliberate whether it was the right choice to go to Kābul. Babur received mixed opinions. Sayyid Yūsuf and a few others suggested that the first move should be into Lamghān as winter was near and Babur could act from there utilizing the advantage offered by the weather. Bāqī Beg and many others said it would be good to move to Kābul at once. After enough brainstorming, Babur went with the latter plan. They resumed the journey. Their next halt was at Ābā-qūrūq.

Babur's mother and the rest of the family members who were left behind in Kāhmard rejoined Babur at Ābā-qūrūq. But they had to face a lot of danger and tough times before they met Babur. Sherīm ṯaghāī was to fetch Babur's families from Kāhmard after having set Khusrau Shāh on his way to Khurāsān. After reaching Dahānah, he found he was not his own master, as Khusrau Shāh accompanied him to Kāhmard, where the latter's sister's son, Aḥmad-i-qāsim was waiting for him. Sherīm ṯaghāī had secretly arranged for several Bāqī beg's Moghūls, who were with Babur's families to lay hands on Khusrau Shāh and Aḥmad-i-qāsim. But the news of this strategy reached the two and they fled along the Kāhmard valley (on the side of Ajar) finally making it to Khurāsān. Perhaps this is what Sherīm ṯaghāī and the Moghūls wanted. Now those in charge of Babur's families were away from the fear of Khusrau Shāh. They guided the families out of Ajar, but some troubling surprises awaited at Kāhmard. The Sāqānchī tribe, like an enemy, blocked the road and plundered the families. Qul-i-bāyazīd's little son, Tīzak was made prisoner and he would reach Kābul four years later. The plundered and ill-fated families crossed by the Qībchāq pass, and rejoined Babur finally in Ābā-qūrūq.

Babur and his company left that camp and went to the Chālāk meadow, with one night's halt. They had already decided to lay siege to Kābul, and they marched forward the very next morning. Moving ahead for the next stopover, people at the centre dismounted somewhere between Ḥaidar Tāqī's garden and
