villages were populated by the Pashāī, Parājī, Tājīk, Bīrkī, and Afghān tribes.

In the western mountains, you would find the Hazāra and Nikdīrī tribes, some of whom spoke the Moghūlī tongue. In the northeastern mountains, there were the territories of the Kāfirs, like Kitūr (or Gawār?) and Gibrik. To the south, you'd come across the lands of the Afghān tribes.

g. Kābul was a place where eleven or twelve languages were spoken: Arabī, Persian, Turkī, Moghūlī, Hindī, Afghānī, Pashāī, Parājī, Gibrī, Bīrkī, and Lamghānī. If there was another region with such a wide array of tribes and languages, it remained unknown.

Sub-divisions of the Kābul country

The country of Kābul was divided into fourteen tūmāns. Bajaur, Sawād, and Hash-Nagar may have been linked to Kābul at one point, but they no longer resembled cultivated regions. Some lay desolate due to the Afghāns, while others were now under their rule.

In the eastern part of the Kābul country, you would find the Lamghānāt, consisting of 5 tūmāns and 2 bulūks of cultivated lands. The largest of these was Nangarhār, sometimes written Nagarahār in historical accounts. The dārogha's residence was in Adīnapūr, about 13 yīghāch east of Kābul. The road to Adīnapūr was challenging, passing through small hill-passes and narrows, but it became safer after being populated at Qarā-tū, below Qūrūq-sāī. On this route, the Bādām-chashma pass marked the boundary between the hot and cold climates. Snow fell on the Kābul side of the pass but not in Qūrūq-sāī. After descending the pass, a distinct landscape emerged, with different trees, plants, animals, and customs.

Nangarhār had nine torrents (tūqūz-rūd) and yielded good rice and corn crops. It was famous for its abundant oranges, citrons, and pomegranates. In AD 1508–09, the Four-gardens, known as the Bāgh-i-wafā (Garden-of-fidelity), were established, producing plentiful oranges, citrons, and pomegranates. The year Babur defeated Pahār Khān and took Lāhore and Dipālpūr he had brought and cultivated plantains (bananas) and sugarcane successfully. Sugarcane was brought a year before banana and some of it were sent to Bukhārā and Badakhshān by Babur.

The garden had a favorable location with running water and a mild winter climate.
