The Safed-koh mountains ran along the southern border of Nangarhār, dividing it from Bangash. No riding-road crossed these mountains. Nine torrents (tūqūz-rūd) originated from the Safed-koh, which retained its snow year-round and hence it got its name. Many places along the Safed-koh had an excellent climate, and its cold waters did not require ice.

The Sūrkh-rūd river flowed to the south of Adīnapūr, where the fort stood on a height with a straight drop of about 130 feet to the river. This isolated fort was well-situated and very strong.

The mountain between Nangarhār and Lamghān was known for its snowfall, serving as a signal for Lamghānīs to know when Kābul had received snow. Traveling from Kābul into the Lamghānāt was achieved through different routes, depending on the starting point. One of the roads led through the Dīrī-pass, crossing the Bārān-water at Būlān, while another went through Qarā-tū, below Qūrūq-sāī, crossing the Bārān-water at Aūlūgh-nūr and proceeding into Lamghān through the pass of Bād-i-pīch. Those coming from Nijr-aū passed through Badr-aū (Tag-aū) and Qarā-nakariq before taking the pass of Bād-i-pīch to enter Lamghān.

Although Nangarhār was one of the five tūmāns of the Lamghān tūmān, the term "Lamghānāt" strictly referred to three specific areas, as mentioned below:

> One of the three is the ʻAlī-shang tūmān, to the north of which are fastness-mountains, connecting with Hindū-kush and inhabited by Kāfirs only. What of Kāfiristān lies nearest to ʻAlī-shang, is Mīl out of which its torrent issues. The tomb of Lord Lām, father of his Reverence the prophet Nuḥ (Noah), is in this tūmān. In some histories, he is called Lamak and Lamakān. Some people are observed often to change kāf for ghain (k for gh); it would seem to be on this account that the country is called Lamghān.
> The second is Alangār. The part of Kāfiristān nearest to it is Gawār (Kawār), out of which its torrent issues (the Gau or Kau). This torrent joins that of ʻAlī-shang and flows with it into the Bārān-water, below Mandrāwar, which is the third tūmān of the Lamghānāt.

One of the two bulūks in Lamghān was the Nūr-valley. This unique place had no equivalent, with its fort perched on a rocky promontory at the valley's entrance, flanked by torrents on both sides. Rice was cultivated on steep terraces, and there was only one road through it. The Nūr-valley was abundant in hot climate fruits, including oranges, citrons, and even a few dates. Along the banks of the torrents below the fort, there were many amlūk trees, a variety of fruit that some Turks called qarā-yīmīsh. These trees were numerous here but not found elsewhere. Grapes were also grown in the valley, trained on trees. The wines produced in the Nūr-valley had a good reputation, with two types of grapes cultivated: arah-tāshī and
