sūhān-tāshī. The former was yellowish, while the latter was a vibrant red. The arah-tāshī grape made a more uplifting wine, although it should be noted that neither wine lived up to its reputation for cheerfulness. Apes (maimūn) could be found high up in one of the glens, but none were seen below. The Nūrīs, the people of the Nūr-valley, used to raise swine but had abandoned this practice in recent times.

Another tūmān in Lamghān was Kūnār-with-Nūr-gal. It was somewhat remote, located away from the Lamghānāt, and its borders encroached into Kāfir lands. Due to these factors, the people of Kūnār-with-Nūr-gal paid relatively little tribute. The Chaghān-sarāī water entered this tūmān from the northeast, flowed on into the Kāma bulūk, joined the Bārān-water, and continued eastward.

Babur talks about Mīr Sayyid ʻAlī Hamadānī,[*] and showers praises on him. He had come to Kābul during his journey and had died 2 miles above Kūnār. His disciples carried his body to Khutlān, and a shrine was erected at the revered site of his passing. Babur made the circumambulation of this shrine when he came and conquered Chaghān-sarāī in AD 1514.

In this tūmān, oranges, citrons, and coriander were abundant. Strong wines were brought down from Kāfiristān into this region.

A curious tale is told in this region, one that seems impossible but had been recounted to Babur repeatedly. Babur mentions that, throughout the hill-country above Multa-kundī, including Kūnār, Nūr-gal, Bajaur, Sawād, and the surrounding areas, it was commonly said that when a woman dies and is laid on a bier, she, if she has not been a wrongdoer, imparts such a shake to the bearers when they lift the bier at its four corners that, despite their reluctance and efforts, her body falls to the ground. However, if she has committed wrongdoing, no movement occurs.

Babur recalls, this tale was not only heard from the people of Kūnār but also repeatedly from those in Bajaur, Sawād, and the entire hill-tract. Ḥaidar-ʻalī Bajaurī, a sulṭān who governed Bajaur effectively, responded uniquely when his mother passed away. He did not weep, engage in lamentation, or wear black attire. Instead, he said, ‘Go! Place her on the bier! If she does not move, I will have her cremated.’ They laid her on the bier, and the anticipated movement occurred. Upon learning of this, he donned black clothing and began lamenting.

(Annette Susannah Beveridge’s note to Multa-kundī.): As Multa-kundī is known the lower part of the tūmān of Kūnār-with-Nūr-gal; what is below (i.e., on the river) belongs to the valley of Nūr and Atar.
