Another bulūk was Chaghān-sarāī, a single village with limited land, located at the mouth of Kāfiristān. Although its inhabitants were Muṣalmān, they mingled with the Kāfirs and, as a result, adopted their customs. A significant torrent, the Kūnār, flowed down to Chaghān-sarāī from the northeast, originating from behind Bajaur. Additionally, a smaller torrent called Pīch descended from Kāfiristān. Chaghān-sarāī was known for its strong yellowish wines, although these were quite different from those found in the Nūr-valley. The village itself had no grapes or vineyards; instead, its wines were all imported from the Kāfiristān-water and Pīch-i-kāfiristānī.

The Pīch Kāfirs came to the villagers' aid when Babur took control of the area. Wine was so commonly consumed that every Kāfir carried a leather wine-bag (khīg) around their neck and preferred wine over water.

Kāma, although not considered an independent district and rather dependent on Nangarhār, was also referred to as a bulūk.

Nijr-aū was another tūmān. It lay north of Kābul, in the Kohistān, with mountains behind it that were inhabited solely by Kāfirs, making it a rather secluded place. The region was abundant in grapes and fruits. Its people produced a substantial amount of wine, but they chose to boil it. They raised many fowls during the winter, were enthusiasts of wine, did not observe prayers, had no moral qualms, and displayed Kāfir-like characteristics.[7]

In the Nijr-aū mountains, there was an abundance of archa, jīlghūza, bīlūt, and Khānjak. The first-named three, archa, jīlghūza, and bīlūt, did not grow above Nigr-aū, but they flourished at lower elevations, resembling the trees of Hindustan. Jīlghūza wood served as the primary source of light for the people; it burned like a candle and had remarkable qualities. The flying-squirre was found in these mountains, an animal larger than a bat and having a curtain (parda), like a bat's wing, between its arms and legs. People often brought one in; it was said to fly downward from one tree to another, as far as a giz flew; but Babur himself had never seen one fly.

Once Babur and his men had put one to a tree. It clambered up directly and got away, but, when people went after it, it spread its wings and came down, without harm, as if it had flown.

Another of the curiosities of the Nijr-aū mountains was the lūkha (var. lūja) bird, also called bū-qalamūn (chameleon) because, between its head and tail, it had four or five changing colors, resplendent like a pigeon's