measuring 10 by 10, and that a symmetrical, right-angled platform be constructed on each of its sides, providing an overview of the entire field of Judas trees. If there was a place in the world that matched this when the arghwāns were in full bloom, Babur did not know of it. The yellow arghwān grew abundantly there, with both the red and yellow varieties flowering simultaneously. A group of plane trees provided pleasant shade above it; holm-oak (Quercus bīlūt) grew in abundance on the slope at its sides. With the exception of these two Oaklands (bīlūtistān), no holm-oak grew in the mountains of western Kābul. The Judas-tree (arghwān) was extensively cultivated in front of it, facing the level ground—cultivated there and nowhere else. People said the three different types of trees were a gift made by three saints, hence its name.

Babur ordered that the spring be enclosed in mortared stonework, measuring 10 by 10, and that a symmetrical, right-angled platform be constructed on each of its sides, providing an overview of the entire field of Judas-trees. If there was a place in the world to match this when the arghwāns were in full bloom, Babur did not know of it. The yellow arghwān also grew abundantly there, with both the red and yellow varieties flowering simultaneously.

To bring water to a large round seat which Babur had constructed on the hillside and planted with willows, a channel was dug across the slope from a half-mill stream that flowed constantly in a valley to the southwest of Sih-yārān. The date of cutting this channel was noted as jūī-khūsh (kindly channel).

Another of the tūmāns of Kābul was Luhūgur (modern Logar). Its primary village was Chīrkh, and notable individuals from this tūman included Maulānā Ya‘qūb and Mullā-zāda ‘Uṣmān. Khwāja Aḥmad and Khwāja Yūnas hailed from Sajāwand, another village in this region. Chīrkh boasted numerous gardens, while other villages in Luhūgur lacked such greenery. The people of Luhūgur were referred to as Aūghān-shāl, a term commonly used in Kābul, seemingly derived from a mispronunciation of Aūghān-sha‘ār.

Again, there was the wilāyat, or, as some said, the tūmān of Ghaznī, which was believed to be the capital of Sabuk-tīgīn, Sultan Maḥmūd, and their descendants. Some people wrote it as Ghaznīn. It was also believed to have been the governmental center of Shihābu’d-dīn Ghūrī, known as Mu‘izzu’d-dīn in the ṭabaqāt-i-nāṣirī and other historical accounts of Hind.
