Bangash was once another tūmān, encircled by Afghān highwaymen, which included groups like the Khūgīānī, Khirilchī, Tūrī, and Landar. Due to its secluded location, its inhabitants were not particularly willing to pay taxes. Babur saw a sign of responsibility there an mentions in Baburnama, ‘there has been no time to bring it to obedience; greater tasks have fallen to me,—the conquests of Qandahār, Balkh, Badakhshān, and Hindustan! But, Allah willing! when I get the chance, I most assuredly will take order with those Bangash thieves.’

One of the bulūks of Kābul was Ālā-sāī, located 4 to 6 miles (2-3 shar‘ī) east of Nijr-aū. The direct road into it from Nijr-aū led, at a place called Kūra, through a relatively small pass that separated the hot and cold climates in that region. During the changing of seasons, many birds migrated through this pass. At those times, the people of Pīchghān, one of the dependencies of Nijr-aū, employed a unique method to catch these birds. They had set up hiding places for the bird-catchers at various points near the mouth of the pass. These bird-catchers had attached one corner of a net a few yards away and secured the lower side with stones to weigh it down. Along one side of the net, for about half its width, they had attached a stick that was about 3 to 4 yards long. The hidden bird-catcher had held this stick and, when the birds had approached, had lifted the net to its full height using the stick. The birds had then entered the net on their own. Sometimes, so many birds were caught using this contraption that there had been hardly enough time to cut there throats.

While the pomegranates of Ālā-sāī were not of the highest quality, they held a local reputation as the best in the vicinity and were frequently transported to Hindustan. Grapes also did well, and the wines produced in Ālā-sāī were known for being of superior quality and higher alcohol content compared to those of Nijr-aū.

Badr-aū (Tag-aū), an adjacent bulūk to Ālā-sāī, did not cultivate fruit but served as a region for grain cultivation, primarily by Kāfir people.

h . Tribesmen of Kābul

Just as Turks and Moghūl clans (aīmāq) had inhabited the open country of Khurāsān and Samarkand, the Hazāra and Afghāns lived in Kābul. Among the Hazāra, the Sulṭān-mas‘ūdi Hazāra had been widely scattered, and among the Afghāns, the Mohmand had been prominent. Revenue of Kābul

The revenues of Kābul, together from the cultivated lands, from tolls (tamghā) and from dwellers in the open country, amounted to 8 lakhs of shāhrukhīs.
