Kamarī couldn't tell anything about it. Disappointed and disgusted when Babur along with his men returned to camp, he communicated to Khwāja Muḥammad-amīn that Gūr-khattrī was in Bīgrām and he didn't say anything about it because of its narrow passages and confined cells. The Khwāja lost his cool and abused him in the worst possible way. He came to Babur and narrated the whole episode, but despite having known about it, Babur decided not to go there as the remaining road was long and they had already spent enough days so far.

Expedition of Kohāt

Babur's next big hurdle was the mighty river Sindh. They were unsure whether to cross Sindh or follow another route. Bāqī Chaghānīānī suggested not crossing the river, and with a night's halt, they would be able to make it to a place called Kohāt. According to him, this place was full of rich tribesmen. The Kābulīs were brought forward for a second opinion and to substantiate what he said. They seconded Bāqī Chaghānīānī's words. Neither Babur nor his men had heard of this place. But Babur chose to go ahead with Bāqī Chaghānīānī's opinion of heading for Kohāt because he was a man of authority and words. Thus, the plan of crossing the Sindh-water into Hindustan was dropped completely. They marched from Jām, forded the Bāra-water and dismounted not far from the pass (dābān) through the Muhammad mountain.

At that time Gāgīānī Afghāns were in Peshawar. The 'Gāgīānī Afghāns' refers to a specific group of Afghans who are a Pashtun tribe primarily located in the Ghaznī and Paktika provinces of Afghanistan, but they are also found in some other regions of the country.

They were in trepidation because of Babur's army and drew off to the skirt hills. One of their headmen came to Babur's camp, and paid obeisance and respect good enough to impress him. Babur decided to take him in as the fajjī (guide). He thought that they might point out the paths in a much more organized way. Finally, Babur and his men left that camp at midnight, crossed Muḥammad-hajj (pass) at dawn, and by breakfast, they descended on Kohāt. They were able to get hold of abundant cattle and buffalo. They also captured those Afghān owners of cattle who had opposed them. But Babur set them free and kept the cattle. Babur's men found Kohāt houses, filled with humongous quantities of corn.

On the other hand, Babur's foragers raided as far as the Sindh River and then rejoined him after nightfall. Meanwhile, Babur did not get what Bāqī Chaghānīānī had promised, and he was badly ashamed of it.