They reached Kābul in the month of Ẕū'l-ḥijja (May) of AD 1505. Babur's four-month-long expedition, full of losses, had just got over. Just a few days ago, Sayyid Yūsuf Aūghlāqchī had succumbed to colic pains.

Nāṣīr Mīrzā's Misconduct

Earlier I had mentioned the incident of Qūsh-guṃbaz, in which Nāṣir Mīrzā had asked Babur for a leave to stay behind on the condition that he would join back in a few days after taking something from his district for his retainers and followers. However, he betrayed, rather misconducted, by going against his desires.

Having left Babur and co, he sent a force against the people of Nūr valley, on the ground of them being rebellious. As mentioned before, it was difficult to move in that valley owing to the strong position of its fort and the rice cultivation of its lands. Faẓlī, the Mīrzā's commander, proved to be highly impracticable on the ground and in that one-road tract, instead of safeguarding his men, sent them for foraging and barged out the farmers of valley. They drove the foragers off and turned the circumstances such that it became impossible for the rest to keep their ground. They even killed a few and captured some with their horses. About this situation, Babur has written, 'Precisely what would happen to any army chancing to be under such a person as Faẓlī? Whether because of this affair, or whether from want of heart, the Mīrzā did not follow us at all; he stayed behind.'

Babur has further written, 'Ayūb's sons, Yūsuf and Bahlūl, more seditious, silly and arrogant persons than whom there may not exist, —to whom I had given, to Yūsuf Alangār, to Bahlūl 'Alī-Shang, they like Nāṣir Mīrzā, were to have taken something from their districts and to have come on with him, but he not coming, neither did they.'[*]

They were the champions of his cups and social pleasures throughout the last winter. They did overrun the Tarkalānī Afghāns in it. During the approaching summer, the Mīrzā made the families of clans, outside tribes and hordes march, driving hard as if they were flocks of sheep (as described by Babur). They marched no different than a herd of sheep carrying all their goods till they reached Bārān water. They were the ones who were lazily enough wintered in Nangarhār and Lamghānāt.
