Shaybāni Khān had left behind. It was not very late when Ḥamza Sulṭān began to march out. He reached as far as the sarāī on the bank of river Amū. He assigned his sons and begs in command of a force there which went on to direct attack against Khusrau Shāh.

Babur has written about the incident in Baburnama: 'There was neither fight nor flight for that fat, little man; Ḥamza Sulṭān's men unhorsed him, killed his sister's son, Aḥmad-i-qāsim, Sherīm the page and several good braves. Him they took into Qūndūz, there struck his head off and from there sent it to Shaybāni Khān in Khwārizm.'

Like Khusrau Shāh had predicted, his former retainers and followers, no sooner than he marched against Qūndūz, changed in their conduct towards Babur.[7] Almost all of them marched near to Khwāja-i-riwāj. The men in Babur's service had grown exponentially. Interestingly, the Moghūls in general began to behave well with Babur taking up a position of adherence to Babur unconditionally. But the news of Khusrau Shāh's death was like simply breaking the tip of the iceberg. All his men began to push themselves out of Babur's command.

Qūtlūq-nigār Khānum Dies and Progression to Qandahār

It was the month of Muharram in AD 1505. Almost a decade had passed when Babur had lost his father, Umar, and his mother had contracted a high fever. She was being treated by a Khurāsānī doctor, Sayyid ṭabīb. Following the Khurāsānī tradition, he gave her watermelon. But fate had nothing good to offer for Babur. She died on Saturday, 10 June 1505.

The next day, she was buried in the New Year's Garden in Kābul. Qāsim Kūkūldāsh accompanied Babur for the final rituals. There also lay Ulugh Beg Mīrzā, Babur's uncle who had built his house long ago at this place. But the streak of mourning wasn't going to stop here. He got to hear the news of the death of his younger Khān dada Alacha Khān (Ahmad Alaq), and grandmother Aīsān-daulat Begum. The news about Ahmad reached around a year later. It was the fortieth day of her mourning when Shāh Begum, the mother of the Khāns, and Mihr-nigār Khānum, Babur's maternal aunt (previously of Sulṭān Aḥmad Mīrzā's ḥaram) arrived with the sad news. It caused another wave of lament for Babur, who was broken to the core once again. He describes the partings to be 'extremely bitter' in the Baburnama. The mourning rites were observed with utmost care. The Qur'an was recited, prayers were offered for the departed
