Bāqī's words. But at the same time, Babur mentions his incivility. In contrast to his earlier opinions, Babur had a complete outburst:[*]

> Quite the contrary, he had done things bad and unmannerly. Mean he was, miserly and malicious, ill-tongued, envious, and cross-natured. So miserly was he that although when he left Tīrmīẕ, with his family and possessions, he may have owned thirty to forty thousand sheep, and although those masses of sheep used to pass in front of us at every camping-ground, he did not give a single one to our bare braves, tortured as they were by the pangs of hunger; at last, in Kāh-mard, he gave fifty.

Although he acknowledged Babur as his Padishah, he had ensured that the nagarets were beaten at his own gate. Babur has said, 'He was sincere to none, had regard for none.' Bāqī completely controlled the revenues. He took the Tamgha from Kābul, along with the dāroghaship in Kābul, Panjhīr, Gadai, Hazāra, and kūshlūk.[10] He was the only one in control of the gate. He was not gratified despite no favours showered on him. He did enough mischief, but all went unnoticed and unaccounted by Babur. Babur has complained in Baburnama that he was always asking for leave though with a little hesitation. Babur was sick of his conduct and character but never said anything at any time. Leave was granted to him but instead he atoned and began to agitate against his own request after it was acknowledged. He wrote as below to Babur:[†]

> His Highness made compact not to call me to account till nine misdeeds had issued from me.[11]

It was then that Babur finally reminded him of his wrongdoings, breaking the silence as an answer. He reminded Bāqī of eleven recent faults in a message sent through Mullā Bābā of Pashāghar. Bāqī had no choice and chose to submit to Babur. Accordingly, he was permitted to make a move towards Hindustan with family and possessions. Few of his retainers returned after escorting him through the Khyber. He crossed the pass at Nilab after having joined the caravan of Bāqī.

A brief about Khyber

The Khyber Pass is a mountainous route in the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province of Pakistan, on the border with Nangarhar Province of Afghanistan. The summit of the pass is around three miles inside Pakistan, following the Asian Highway 1. It descends 460 metres into the valley of Peshawar at Jamrud, which is around 30 kilometres from the Afghan border by traversing a section of Spin Ghar Mountains.
