collected around 500 sheep and twenty-five horses. Babur was leading the campaign to collect the war booty for the second time. He had last done so while coming from Khurāsān (in AD 1506) and then too, the victims were the same—Turkmān Hazāras. The scroungers of Babur brought abundant sheep and horses. The wives and children of Hazāras had climbed up the snowy slope to keep themselves safe. Seeing their dwellings empty, Babur along with his men dismounted there as it had already begun to turn dark. It was next to impossible to ride at night given the thickness of snow this winter. Babur has described the peril:[*]

> Deep indeed was the snow that winter! Off the road it was up to a horse's qāptāl, so deep that the night-watch was in the saddle all through till shoot of dawn.

The next day, Babur left out of the valley, yet the intense snow couldn't let them go beyond its mouth where they would spend the whole night. They began to march the next day only to dismount after reaching Janglīk. Babur instructed Yārak ṭaghāī to go with his band and kill the remaining Hazāras, who seemed to be hiding in a cave. Babur has mentioned in the Baburnama that around eighty of them were slain by the sword.

Having finished this Hazāra expedition successfully, Babur went to Āī-tūghdī which was a neighbourhood below Bārān.[12] He had come here to collect the revenue of Nijr-aū. It was there that Jahāngīr Mīrzā waited on Babur after having arrived from his mission of Ghaznī.

On 7 February of AD 1506, on the thirteenth day of Ramzan, sciatic pain hit Babur and it was so troublesome that someone had to always help him turn from one side to the other for about six weeks. Finally, people made some arrangements to carry Babur and they traversed along the bank of river Bārān, cruising into the Būstān-sarāī. They stayed there comfortably for a couple of days, and Babur was able to recover from the pain. But as the pain got over, a boil appeared on his left cheek. It was pierced and the infection was purged out through some medication.

Jahāngīr Mīrzā had to further wait on Babur. It was during that period that the sons of Ayūb, Yūsuf and Buhlūl had spit enough seditious venom against Babur. It had changed the attitude of Jahāngīr completely. Just in a few days, loaded with rebellious temperament, he marched out of Tīpa, hurrying back to Ghaznī decorated as a warrior clad in mail. He captured Nānī upon reaching there. In the process, he killed a few and left the whole vicinity plundered. Soon, he marched ahead through the Hazāras,[13] heading for Bamiyan.

In the Baburnama, he states:[*]
