Even Khadīja Begum was present. They had a good meal after which Muẓaffar Mīrzā took Babur to ṭarab-khāna (a place built by Babur Mirza[*]) where a wine party was organized. The place known as the joy-house was a two-storied adobe built in the middle of a small garden. Babur has given a good description of the place:[†]

> Great pains have been taken with its upper story; this has a retreat in each of its four corners, the space between each two retreats being like a shāh-nīshīn;[21] in between these retreats and shāh-nīshīns is one large room on all sides of which are pictures which, although Bābur Mīrzā built the house, were commanded by Abū-sa'īd Mīrzā and depict his own wars and encounters.

> Two divans had been set in the north shāh-nīshīn, facing each other, and with their sides turned to the north.

Of the four divans mentioned, on one sat Muẓaffar Mīrzā and Babur. On the second one Sulṭān Mas'ūd Mīrzā and Jahāngīr Mīrzā. Babur's place was elevated out of honour. The cups and mugs were oozing with wine. The cupbearers kept serving it to the guests and soon most of them turned high. They drank as if they were thirsty for it since forever.

Babur, a teetotaller, was forced to drink this time. Babur didn't touch wine until AD 1511, when he was thirty years old.[*]

> Though up till then I had not committed the sin of wine-drinking and known the cheering sensation of comfortable drunkenness, I was inclined to drink wine and my heart was drawn to cross that stream. I had had no inclination for wine in my childhood; I knew nothing of its cheer and pleasure. If, as sometimes, my father pressed wine on me, I excused myself; I did not commit the sin. After he died, Khwāja Qāẓī's right guidance kept me guiltless; as at that time I abstained from forbidden viands, what room was there for the sin of wine? Later on, when, with the young man's lusts and at the prompting of sensual passion, desire for wine arose, there was no-one to press it on me, no-one indeed aware of my leaning towards it; so that, inclined for it though my heart was, it was difficult of myself to do such a thing, one thitherto undone. It crossed my mind now, when the Mīrzās were so pressing and when too we were in a town so refined as Herī, 'Where should I drink if not here? here where all the chattels and utensils of luxury and comfort are gathered and in use.' So saying to myself, I resolved to drink wine; I determined to cross that stream; but it occurred to me that as I had not taken wine in Badī'u'z-zamān Mīrzā's house or from his hand, who was to me as an elder brother, things might find way into his mind if I took wine in his younger brother's house and from his hand. Having so said to myself, I mentioned my doubt and difficulty.

After Babur's resistance and explanation, they said, 'Both the excuse and the obstacle are reasonable.' Having said so they didn't force Babur anymore to drink. But they settled on a condition that Babur must drink whenever he would be in the company of the elder and the younger Mirzas.
