Lots of musicians were present on the occasion. They have been named in the Baburnama—Ḥāfiẓ Ḥājī, Jalālu'd-dīn Maḥmūd the flautist and Ghulām shādī's younger brother, Ghulām bacha the Jews' harpist. Ḥāfiẓ Ḥājī presented a beautiful song calmly and melodiously. Babur criticized the Samarkandi singer Mīr Jān by describing his songs as harsh, loud and out of tune. He was brought in by Jahāngīr. According to Babur, Khurāsānīs were well-mannered people and hence, despite the singing being so unpleasant, none rose to make him stop singing. This perhaps was also because of the consideration for the Mīrzā.

The sun had retired and the time for the evening prayers had come. Post the prayers, they all left the ṭarab-khāna and went to the new house in Muẓaffar Mīrzā's winter quarters. The alcohol was served there too the very night and one Yūsuf-i-'alī danced quite a bit once he was high. He was a master of music and a great dancer. The party was warm and comforting as the night passed. Muẓaffar Mīrzā gifted Babur a lambskin surtout, a sword belt and a grey horse. Two of Mīrzā's slaves, Big Moon and Little Moon indulged in offensive acts on the drunken night. Everyone left after the party concluded, except Babur.

When Qāsim Beg heard of Babur being forced to drink, he got a bit anxious and offended. He soon sent someone to Ẕū'n-nūn Beg. The man carried some advice for both Ẕū'nnūn and Muẓaffar Mīrzā. The message was harsh and diplomatic, but impactful and plain enough. Thereupon, the Mīrzās never pressed Babur to have wine again. When Badī'u'z-zamān Mīrzā heard of Muẓaffar hosting a party for Babur, he called Babur and some of his trusted men to a feast arranged in the Maqauwī-khāna in a beautiful garden of the region. The trusted men were not so open to alcohol as well.

Babur has written about this awkward situation:[*]

> Those about me could never drink (openly) on my own account; if they ever did drink, they did it perhaps once in forty days, with door strap fast and under a hundred fears. Such as these were now invited; here too they drank with a hundred precautions, sometimes calling off my attention, sometimes making a screen of their hands, notwithstanding that I had given them permission to follow common custom, because this party was given by one standing to me as a father or elder brother. People brought in weeping-willows (. . .)

At the feast, a goose was being roasted in front of Babur. But Babur never craved the meat of birds and showed no excitement, unlike the others. After sometime Badī'u'z-zamān Mīrzā asked Babur, 'Do you not like it?'

Babur said slowly with a smile, 'I am a poor carver.'

And then, with a smile, Mīrzā offered the roasted bird to Babur.
