The snow blanket had made the cave appear smaller than its size. Babur took a shovel and carved out a place near the cave's mouth for about the size of a Namaz mat. He had dug the place hard till his breast, yet there was no trace of ground whatsoever. Babur took shelter within that shovelled space. His people kept asking him to come inside the cave, but he refused and chose to stay in what he had dug. His mind was lost in a thought which read as below:[*]

> Some of my men in snow and storm, I in the comfort of a warm house! the whole horde outside in misery and pain, I inside sleeping at ease! That would be far from a man's act, quite another matter than comradeship! Whatever hardship and wretchedness there is, I will face; what strong men stand, I will stand; for, as the Persian proverb says, to die with friends is a nuptial.

Babur calmly sat in that snowstorm in the dugout place till the bedtime prayer. The layer of snow, no thinner than four hands had covered his head and back. The storm raged till the point where one couldn't see clearly or hear, for even eyes or ears were coated with the layer of snow. He shivered lightly even though the thickest possible clothes covered him. The cold had begun to affect Babur's ears badly.

The time for the night prayers had arrived. Someone looked thoroughly and carefully inside and shouted aloud, 'It is a very roomy cave with a place for everybody.' Hearing so, Babur was delighted and wanted to smile, but the acute storm didn't let him. Babur shook away the snow and asked his men around him to get inside. The cave indeed had a place for around five dozen men. People stormed in and brought out their rations, cold meat, parched grain, along with whatever they had. It was a great feeling to have stayed in such a chilled skin-piercing, stormy environment in a warm, cozy and quiet space.

The next day the storm had gone away, and it wasn't snowing at all. Babur and his men started early. They again embarked on the daunting journey by making a way by stamping the snow. The proper road which they saw seemed to be making a detour up through the mountain flank, snaking even higher. They thought it was the Zirrīn pass. They took the road and went straight to the bottom of valley.[26] By night, they could reach the further side of the Bakkak Pass. They spent the night in the mouth of the valley. This night too was not ready to give respite from the mighty cold. The saga of distress and suffering was to continue. The hands and legs of most of the men had been frost-bitten.

The next morning, with trust in Allah, they rode straight down. The slope was bad with sudden falls and certainly, it didn't look like the correct one. By the time of evening prayer, they were able to get out of the valley.
