When they drew closer, Babur thought of sending the missive to the begs again through Aḥmad, the messenger, and Qarā Aḥmad. The message read:[*]

> Here we are at the time promised; be ready! Be bold!

They crossed the Minār hill and dismounted on the skirt. The cold experienced during the journey had affected them—the chill continued unabated. They ignited fire to warm themselves and fight the cold for some time. It must be noted that it was not the signal fire for the begs but only lit for the purpose of warming themselves.

As the dawn cracked again after the last night's survival, they left from the Minār hill. The snow worsened towards Kābul. Horses were buried knee-deep. They had to ride in a single file for the whole way on this road.

But like every cloud has a silver lining, their ride in a single file made them highly undiscoverable. By the time they reached Bībī Māh-rūī (Lady Moon-face), they could see the blaze of fire on the citadel, giving them the signal that the begs were looking out for them.

They reached the Sayyid Qāsim's bridge. The men on the right, including Sherīm ṯaghāī, were told to move towards Mullā Bābā's bridge. Those on the left and centre were told to go ahead on the Bābā Lūlī road. Within the Khalīfa's garden existed a small garden made by Aūlūgh Beg Mīrzā for a langar (almshouse). Although there was no trace of trees or shrubs that existed earlier, the walls stood unblemished. Mīrzā Khān was seated in this garden. Muḥammad Ḥusain Mīrzā was lying in the Aūlūgh Beg Mīrzā's great Bāgh-i-bihisht. Babur had gone as far along the lane of Mullā Bābā's garden, which turned to the burial ground. He encountered four men—Lord of the Gate Sayyid Qāsim, Qāsim Beg's son Qaṃbar-i-'alī, Sher-qulī the scout and one from the latter's band namely Sulṯān Aḥmad Moghūl—hurrying towards Mīrzā Khān's quarters. They were beaten badly and forced to turn away. The commotion alerted Mīrzā Khān, and he fled.

Several had sided with Mīrzā Khān. Even, Muhammad Ḥusain, the younger brother of Abū'l-ḥasan the armourer, had joined the service of Mīrzā Khān.

Muhammad Ḥusain jumped at Sher-qulī, one among those four and threw him down. Husain tried to slash Sher. He was about to behead him when Sher-qulī somehow just managed to free himself. The four so-called warriors were wounded badly and came running to Babur.

Babur's horsemen were blocked in the narrow lane and were unable to make a move in any direction. But Babur was keen for the action and yelled, 'Get off