seven years before (AD 1524 to AD 1525) the death of Babur. Lots of matter was added by Khwānd-amīr after he came to Hindustan in AD 1538. Tārīkh-i-rashīdī was completed under Humāyūn in AD 1547, just three years before the author was killed at the hands of Kashmiris. One can say that his work is one of the most important sources for everyone who is especially interested in studying Babur. I come to this belief considering how close he was to Babur's family. He stayed in Babur's protection from when he turned eleven to when he turned thirteen. For the next nineteen years, he served under Sa'īd Khān in Kāshghar, who happened to be a mutual cousin between Babur and him. When Khān died he went on to serve Babur's sons Kāmrān and Humāyūn in Hindustan.

Annette Susannah Beveridge also indicates a piece of literature called Sūlūku'l-mulūk published by a Sunnī centre of Aūzbegs. It was written by Faẓl bin Ruzbahān Isfahānī at the orders of 'Ubaidu'l-lāh Khān Aūzbeg. It is a treatise on Islamic law and was written to fulfil the vow that the latter had made before attacking Babur in AD 1512 at the shrine of Khwāja Aḥmad Yasawī (in Ḥaẓrat Turkistān). The vow was that if he would turn victorious against Babur he would conform exactly with the divine (Islamic) law and uphold it in Māwarā'u'n-nahr (Transoxiana). The preface of this text talks of the spread of sacrilege in Transoxiana because of Babur's invasions.

Before jumping into the works of Firsihta, I thought it would be great to dwell on his own sources as he was writing almost a century and a half after Babur's death. It was the Tārīkh-i Ḥājī Muḥammad 'Ārif Qandahārī that appears frequently in the writing. This becomes an important source because he belonged to Qandahār where Babur had enough adventure during his unchronicled years. The author was also the witness of Bairām Khān-i-khānān's assassination on 31 January of AD 1561. He was the servant of the assassinated. Unfortunately, even though all his records around Akbar survive, there is no manuscript concerning Babur's period.

Then we have a Shia source called Lubbu't-tawārīkh by Yahya Kazwīnī written in AD 1541. But it gives us only a brief account of Babur's life. It was commissioned by Shāh Ismā'īl Ṣafawī's son Bahrām. We have one more Shia source published by the Ṣafawī Center. It is called Tārīkh-i-'ālam-arāī and was written by Mīr Sikandar. It was completed in AD 1616. One can get a brief account of how Babur dealt with Shāh Ismā'īl in this source.

One of the most important sources for Babur's unchronicled years however in my opinion can be Firishta's Tārīkh-i-firishta. It was finished in the first quarter of the seventeenth century and was commissioned by Jahāngīr (Babur's great-grandson). While studying the works of William Erskine, I observed that he has referred frequently to Tārīkh by Khwāfī Khān. It can be considered as a tertiary
