(name unknown). On arrival, they brought a mule skin, the horn of Ox, and a few ravenous and half-naked African slaves:[*]

Having received them, Aurangzeb gifted back the following:

a) A brocade sash
b) A silken and embroidered girdle
c) A turban of the same materials and workmanship

Not only that, but Aurangzeb also ordered for complete maintenance of those ambassadors in the city of Agra at public expense. On a later audience, he once again gifted them very well. He gave both another sash along with a present of Rs 6000. But what is interesting to note here is that he divided money unequally based on religion. The Muslim merchant received Rs 4000 while Murat received only Rs 2000.[†]

Here, the merchant fooled Aurangzeb the best he could. The cunning one promised Aurangzeb that once he reaches home, he would urge the monarch of Ethiopia to permit the repair of a mosque destroyed by the Portuguese. Being lured by him, Aurangzeb gave ambassadors an extra Rs 2000 expecting the mosque to be repaired in Ethiopia.[‡]

We then get details about an embassy that had come from the Aūzbeg Tatars. They had brought the following:

a) some boxes of lapis-lazuli
b) a few long-haired camels
c) several horses
d) some camel loads of fresh fruit, such as apples, pears, grapes, melons, and many loads of dry fruit.

Bernier described the Aūzbeg Tatars as being remarkable for the ‘filthiness of their persons’. He has also said, ‘There are probably no people more narrow-minded, sordid, or unclean than the Aūzbeg Tatars.’

Here again, Aurangzeb took no offense with respect to his general attitude just because the embassies were Muslim. He showered them the best of favours and honour in front of all courtiers. He presented each one with two rich shashes and Rs 8000 in cash. He also presented a big number of the richest and most exquisitely shaped brocades, several fine linens, silk material interwoven with gold and silver, a few carpets, and two daggers set with precious stones.[*]
