southern ends of Fanakat.[3] [4] [*] It finally diverted directly north and moved towards Turkistan. It was popularly known as the ‘Water of Khujand’. This river was much different than the other rivers in general. It did not end in any sea, rather it sank into the sands, at an extensive distance below Turkistan.

Babur’s land (Figure 1), Ferghana, had seven towns. Five of them lay on the south and two to the north of the Fanakat. The capital city of Andijān was one among the five in the south and it was located centrally. Although the capital produced plenty of grains and fruits, it was best known especially for admirable grapes and splendid melons. Also, the Andijān pears were known to be the best in that region. The fort of Andijān happened to be the third largest in Mawara’u’n-Nahr (now known as Transoxiana) after that of Samarkand and Kesh. The fort of Andijān had three gates and the citadel lay on the south. Water entered through nine channels, and eccentrically none came out even in a single place. There was a gravelled highway at the edge of the moat. Babur mentions that it was wide enough to divide the suburbs with affluence. Hunting and fowling were the favourite pastimes of the people of Andijān.

Babur mentions that according to the rumours, the pheasants of Andijān grew so fat that even four people could not finish eating it with its stew.

Interestingly all the inhabitants of Andijān were Turks, but generally, not even a single citizen of the town or the bazaar knew the Turki language. The people of Andijān were known for their good looks and artistic traits. Babur talks of great Andijāni musician, Khwaja Yusuf while trying to emphasize the artistic attributes of the place. He also talks of the writings of Mir’ Ali-Shir Nava’i.[5]
