cruelty towards pious and erudite Sunnīs, especially in Herat, spread throughout Transoxiana.

Babur exhibited a desire for emancipation, both during the period when he not only dismissed his Persian allies but also treated the envoy, Muhammad Jān, with such indifference. Muhammad Jān, who held the title of Najm ṣānī's Lord of the Gate, felt slighted and reported that Babur displayed arrogance, opposition, and an unwillingness to fulfil his commitments. This sentiment continued later when Babur made a fervent but unassisted attempt to conquer 'Ubaid Khān and suffered defeat. It exemplifies the Shah's perspective on his suzerain relationship with Babur that, upon hearing Muhammad Jān's report, he instructed Najm ṣānī to discipline the offending party.

In the meantime, it appears that the Shāh's stipulations were implemented in Samarkand, clearly demonstrating Babur's subservience.[4] There are clear indications of these circumstances: Babur had made promises and was a man of his word; Sunni animosity against him was escalating and not subsiding due to factors that nourished it; Babur was aware of his vulnerability against the Aūzbegs without foreign assistance and anticipated an impending attack; he would become aware of Muḥammad Jān's report and Najm ṣānī's orders against him. Honesty, strategic considerations, and necessity all compelled him to fulfill his agreement. To determine the precise terms of that agreement, aside from the ones related to the khuṭba and the coins, requires a close examination of the sources to avoid interpreting metaphors as facts. Babur faced intense emotions, including ambition, religious fervor, sectarian bias, and fear. His challenge was greater than that faced by Henry of Navarre and Napoleon in Egypt; they only needed to appear as what secured their acceptance, while Babur had to adopt a persona that brought him hatred.

Khān-zāda was not the sole member of Babur's family to rejoin him after marrying an Aūzbeg. His half-sister Yādgār Sulṭān had been married to Ḥamza Sulṭān's son, 'Abdu'l-laṭīf, in AD 1502, when Shaybāni defeated the Khāns near Akhsī. Now that her half-brother had defeated her husband's family, she returned to her own people.[*]

19 March AD 1512 to 9 March of AD 1513

a) Return of the Aūzbegs

Encouraged by the departure of the Persian troops, the Aūzbegs, in the spring of the year, emerged from Turkistān, with their primary assault aimed at Tashkent, which was then under the control of Babur.[5] 'Ubaid Khān set out for