All things considered, there are valid reasons to accept Khwānd-amīr's account that Babur confronted 'Ubaid with a relatively small force.

Following his account therefore we are informed as below:

> Babur in his excess of daring, marched to put the Aūzbeg down with a small force only, against the advice of the prudent, of whom Muḥammad Mazīd Tarkhān was one, who all said it was wrong to go out unprepared and without reinforcement. Paying them no attention, Babur marched for Bukhārā, was rendered still more daring by news had when he neared it, that the enemy had retired some stages, and followed him up almost to his camp. 'Ubaid was in great force; many Aūzbegs perished but, in the end, they were victors and Bābur was compelled to take refuge in Bukhārā. The encounter took place near Kul-i-malik (King's-lake) in Ṣafar 918 AH (April–May of AD 1512).

c) Babur Leaves Samarkand

Maintaining a foothold in Samarkand was not possible, so Babur gathered his family and entourage[6] and headed to Ḥiṣār. Accompanying him on this journey were Māhīm and her children, including Humāyūn, Mihr-jahān, and Bārbūl, as well as the motherless Ma'ṣūma. Gul-rukh was also with her son Kāmrān.[†]

There is no detailed account of Babur's specific route during this journey, and Haidar, who did not travel with Babur due to his illness in Samarkand, provides no information about it. This absence of information could be an indication that the Aūzbegs had not yet appeared directly on the road to Ḥiṣār. However, local tradition suggests that Babur may have taken a detour through Ferghana. It's plausible that Babur ventured into Ferghana with the hope of cooperating with Sa'īd Khān, especially since Tashkent was still resisting under Aḥmad-i-qāsim Kohbur. It's clear that not all activity in Babur's force had been extinguished because, during the siege of Tashkent, Dost Beg managed to break through the enemy's lines and enter the town. Sairām held out longer than Tashkent. There is only a hint, possibly a legend, regarding any such movement by Babur into Andijān.[7]

d) Babur in Ḥiṣār

Despite the significant gains and losses, he had experienced, Babur was still under 30 years of age.

After Babur's departure, the Aūzbegs reoccupied Bukhārā and Samarkand without causing harm to the townspeople. A few weeks later, in Jumāda-I (July-August of AD 1512), they followed him to Ḥiṣār. In the meantime, with the help of Mīrzā Khān, Babur had fortified the town by constructing massive earthworks that effectively closed off the streets. This led the Aūzbeg sulṭāns to believe that the defenders were prepared to sacrifice their lives to hold Ḥiṣār, and as a result, they chose not to launch an attack.[8]