especially known for its little but elegant gardens. People believed that the air blowing in Kasan was the best in the country. The bed of gardens was no less than a torrent. Interestingly people called those beds like the front of a coat. It wasn't an easy job to decide which town, Kasan or Osh, had more scenic beauty and a pleasing climate.

The mountains around Ferghana had amazing summer pastures. Here, a unique tree called Tabalghy with red willows grew. Its timber was used to make staves. It was even used to craft birdcages and scrape stacks of arrows. Babur mentions it to be a source of excellent wood whose rarity was spoken for thousands of miles. Few works of literature of that time talk of mandrake (used for inducing sleep and as a pain-killing agent) being found in those mountain ranges, but nothing was heard of it close to Babur's period. But an herb named Aylq Auti with similar qualities was heard about. Turquoise and iron mines were found in abundance in the mountains of Ferghana.
