Yunus' brother Esen Buqa died in the same year when his first son was born. The Mughals were divided with the opinion of choosing Mughalistan's new Khān. Few looked forward at Esen's son, Dost Muhammad, while other lot supported Yunus. The Dughlat Amir of Kashgar, Muhammad Haidar Mīrzā, supported Esen's Son, but his brother Saniz Mīrzā, the Amir of Yarkand (He had taken Yunus Khān's help and invited him into Kashgar in AD 1457) supported Yunus Khān, and expelled Dost Mohammad from Kashgar. Dost Mohammad was not going to let it go at ease. He consolidated his hold in Eastern Mughalistan. It was known as Uyghurstan in that period. He became the ruler of that region taking up habitation in the town of Aksu, thereby giving away the ongoing nomadic lifestyle. In AD 1464, Saniz Mīrzā died, and as expected Dost Muhammad didn't let the opportunity go away. Dost goes on to plunder Kashgar thereby avenging his expulsion. But shortly, somewhere in the last days of 1460s Dost died and Yunus Khān was able to seize Aksu. The only child of Dost Muhammad, Kebek Sultan, was whisked away by his supporters to Uyghurstan, the old refuge of his father. He was only a purported ruler for few years till being killed by the same people who had whisked him away.

Yunus Khān kept ruling as the Khān from Aksu. He had also maintained good relations with the Timurids, and the founders of the Khazak Horde (in AD 1465–AD 66); Janybek Khān and Karai Khān. His alliance with Khazaks costed him rivalry with the Uzbeks. In 1468 AD, the Uzbek leader Shaikh Haidar came into confrontation with the Mughals. This conflict did not end up being a pleasing one for the Uzbeks. They end up being defeated. Shaikh Haidar was killed. This brought almost three decades pause among them until the rise of Muhammad Shaybāni by the end of the fifteenth century.

On the other hand, Yunus dealt with the Timurids far more differently. The Timurid ruler Abu Sa'id had been Yunus Khān'smentor. He was responsible for Yunus' rise from rags to riches. Abu Sa'id Mīrzā was killed by the White Sheep Turkmen in AD 1468 AD. Because of which his realm was split among his sons. Sultan Ahmad Mīrzā, the eldest son, governed Samarkand and Bukhara. Sultan Mahmud Mīrzā, the third son, assumed authority over Balkh and Badakhshan, while the fourth son, Umar Shaikh Mīrzā II, ascended as the ruler of Ferghana. Notably, all three of these princes would eventually marry Yunus Khan's three daughters, despite their initially contentious interactions with him.

With the passing of Abu Sa'id Mīrzā, Yunus Khān had held sway over the Mughals for approximately six years. However, during this time, his standing among his key Amirs had significantly declined. The source of their dissatisfaction was rather peculiar. They grew disenchanted with Yunus