because he had embraced urban living, forsaking the traditional nomadic lifestyle of the Mughals. Having spent a considerable portion of his life in the towns of Yazd and Shiraz as a student, Yunus had acquired a taste for settled urban life, which seemed more comfortable to him. Due to this unusual point of contention, the Amirs extended an invitation to Shaikh Jamal Khān, Governor of Tashkent under Sultan Ahmad, to replace Yunus Khān and seize power.

The Mughals acquiesced to Shaikh Jamal Khān, who assumed authority and incarcerated Yunus Khān for a year. However, the outcome was far from what the Amirs had anticipated, and a period of regret commenced for them regarding their decision. Shaikh Jamal Khān proved to be an imprudent and inconsiderate ruler. He even offered Yunus's first wife, Isan Daulat Begum, who was the maternal grandmother of Babur, as a war prize to his officer, Khoja Kalan. Tragically, Khoja met his demise at the hands of Isan's female attendants when he attempted to remove her from her residence. This incident marred Shaikh Jamal Khān's reputation in the eyes of the Amirs, as he had demonstrated himself to be a reckless and insensitive administrator.

In AD 1472, the Amirs took action, having Shaikh Jamal Khān killed, and power was reinstated to Yunus Khān. However, they extracted a promise from Yunus to renounce urban living and return to the conservative Mughal nomadic lifestyle.

Subsequently, Yunus Khān received news of the demise of Kebek Sultan, Dost Mohammad's young son, who had been killed by his own followers. Encouraged by these developments, Yunus Khān extended his influence to Eastern Mughalistan (Uyghurstan).

Yunus Khān also began to actively involve himself in the affairs of the Timurids. He established kinship ties with many prominent Timurids, marrying three of his daughters to three sons of his former mentor, Abu Sa'id. Mihr Nigar Khānim wed Sultan Ahmad Mīrzā, Qutlugh Nigar Khānum married Umar Shaikh Mīrzā II in AD 1475, and their son was Babur. Finally, Sultan Nigar Khānum was wed to Sultan Mahmud Mīrzā, and their son, Sultan Vais Mīrzā (Mīrzā Khān), ascended to the throne of Badakhshan. Yunus Khān maintained a special connection with his second son-in-law, Umar Shaikh Mīrzā II, who was the father of Babur.

2 Umar Shaikh had allocated winter territories to Yunus Khān, as the Timurids were predominantly settled in urban areas, governing the adjoining provinces. Yunus Khān remained true to his promise to the Amirs by maintaining this arrangement. Umar, possessing a poetic disposition, occasionally found it challenging to manage highly volatile situations. At times, he sought the
