assistance of his father-in-law, Yunus Khān, to mediate conflicts with his elder brother, Ahmad Mīrzā. The source of their strained relationship since childhood was relatively unknown, yet Yunus Khān frequently stepped in to reconcile the issues between his two sons-in-law.

Despite his advancing age, Yunus Khān remained remarkably ambitious and astute. In AD 1484, during a period of ongoing conflict between Ahmad and Umar, Yunus Khān seized control of Tashkent. At the age of seventy, he once again yearned to transition from the nomadic lifestyle to settled urban living. This desire for city life persisted throughout his existence, except for a particular phase. Tashkent, a significant city along the Silk Route, boasted a cosmopolitan atmosphere akin to Persian cities and represented the epitome of Central Asian urban living. Observing the city's advantages and alluring amenities, Yunus decided to reside there for an extended period. However, this decision left the Mughals disgruntled. Yunus's son, Ahmad Alaq, led a faction of Mughals to Mughalistan in response.

Meanwhile, Yunus Khān was unable to quell the rise of Dughlat Mīrzā Abu Bakr, who had previously captured Yarkand, Khotan, and Kashgar from other members of his family. During the Ming Turpan Border Wars, he had annexed Hami in AD 1473, but the Chinese subsequently expelled him to Turfan.

In the late 1480s, Yunus Khān fell ill and remained ailing until his passing in AD 1487, which occurred in Tashkent. His eldest son, Sultan Mahmud Khān, succeeded him in Tashkent, while in the eastern regions, the Mughals followed Ahmad Alaq's leadership.

3 Nassiruddin Ubaidullah Ahrar, popularly known as Khwaja Ahrar was a Hanafi Maturidi member of the Golden Chain of the Naqshbandi Sufi order of Central Asia (Nishapuri, 2002). He was born in Samarkand, Uzbekistan in AD 1404to a religious and devout Muslim family (Ṣafī, 2001). Khwaja Mehmood Shashi bin Khwaja Shahabuddin was his father. The traditions say that Ahrar's forefathers had migrated from Baghdad and his lineage connected to Abu Bakr Siddique from his paternal side and Umar Farooq from the maternal side (Mawlānā Šayḫ., 2004).

Khwaja's father was a farmer by profession and a Hajji following footsteps of his father Shahabuddin Shahsi. Shahabuddin had good agricultural trade. His maternal grandfather Khwaja Daud was the son of a well-known Sufi Mystic Khwaja Khawand. Khawand was the son of Umar Baghistani, a famous shaikh who was honoured by Bahauddin Naqshband (Ṣafī, 2001 p. 250).