according to Professor André Wink the followers of this god were certainly Hindu despite parallel lines have been noted with pre-Buddhist religious and monarchy practices in Tibet coated with Zoroastrian influence in its ritual (Wink, 1991) (Bosworth, 1977). On the other hand, scholars like H. Schaeder and N. Sims-William have tried to show their connection with the Zoroastrian deity of that period (A Unique Alxon-Hunnic Horse-and-Rider Statuette, (Late Fifth Century C E) from Ancient Bactria / Modern Afghanistan in the Pritzker Family Collection, Chicago, 2019).

Coming to the territories of Zunbils, they had possession of region between what is now the city of Zaranj in southwestern Afghanistan and Kābulistan in the northeast. In the south their territory reached at times the cities of Rakhwad (al-Rukhkhaj) and Bost (near Kandahar). Zamindawar and Ghazni served as their capitals (Wink, 1991).

Etymologically, the title Zunbil can be traced back to the Middle-Persian Zūn-dātbar (Zun the Justice-giver). The geographical name of their capital Zamindawar also comes from Middle Persian 'Zamin-i dātbar' (Land of the Justice-giver) (Bosworth, 2002).

For more than two centuries of their rule, the Tokhara Yabghus, followed by the Turk Shahis and the Zunbils were consistently an obstacle to the eastward expansion of Muslims Invaders. The Tokhara Yabghus were a dynasty of Western Turk–Hephtalite sub-kings with the title "Yabghus," who ruled from AD 625 in Tokharistan north and south of the Oxus River, with some smaller remnants surviving in the area of Badakhshan until AD 758. Their legacy extended to the southeast where it met the Turk Shahis and the Zunbils until the ninth century AD.

Came the year of AD 643and the catastrophe broke on the idolators, as the Arabian forces raided Sistan for the first time. The Turkic territory was under attack from the west of south (Kim, 2015).

A decade later, in AD 653, Abd al-Rahman ibn Samura of the Rashidun Caliphate led an army of around 6,000 Arabs reaching the pious shrine of Zoon in Zamindawar. The hate for idols reflected at its might and humiliation was the testimony they wished to lay on the idol they came across. The primary sources report that Samura broke one of the hands of the idol and plucked out the rubies that shined as the eyes of the god, to reflect in history about the worthlessness of the deity the Zunbils worshipped. Samura asserted to the marzbān (a class of margraves, warden of the marches, and by extension military commanders) that, "my intention was to show you that this idol can do neither any harm nor good." (Wink, 1990) (al-Baladhuri, 1924)