Almost two decades later in AD 665, the Arabs under Abd al-Rahman ibn Samura (now a general of the Umayyad Caliphate and caliphal governor of Sijistan), took over Kābul for the first time which weakened the Nezak Huns a big time (From the Sasanians to the Huns New Numismatic Evidence from the Hindu Kush, 2014) (htt13) (Kim, 2015). This power show of Samura won't last long, and the Turkic ruler Barha Tegin soon gave a bloody nose to the Arabs. He took back the areas of Kābul and Zabulistan (around Ghazni), as well as the region of Arachosia going as far as Kandahar. Thereby he found a new dynasty of the Turk Shahis in AD 665 (Kim, 2015) (Coinage of the Nezak).

We find the first mention of Rutbil in Arab sources dates to AD 666 (Rehman, 2006). It is postulated that he may be the brother or nephew of Barha Tegin, whom latter would have appointed as the governor in Zabulistan after conquering the region from Ghar-ilchi (Petrie, 2020) (Rehman, 2006). Rutbil along the king of Kābul got together in the campaign against the Arabs after Abdur Rahman ibn Samura was replaced as the governor of Sistan.

Rabi ibn Ziyad al-Harithi upon assuming governorship in AD 671 attacked Rutbil at Bost and drove him to al-Rukhkhaj (Petrie, 2020). His new successor Ubayd Allah ibn Abi Bakra continued the warring against Rutbil upon being appointed in AD 673. With no option left in given situation Rutbil had to negotiate a truce treaty for both Kābul and Zabul, in which the governor of Sistan acknowledged control of these territories by Rutbil and the King of Kābul (Petrie, 2020).

Came the death of first Turk Shahi ruler Barha Tegin and his dynasty split into two. In AD 680, Tegin Shah became the king of the Turk Shahis, and his realm ranged from Kābulistan to Gandhara and Zabulistan (Coinage of the Nezak). His lived with the title, "Khorasan Tegin Shah" (meaning Tegin, King of the East), and he was known as Wusan teqin sa in the Chinese sources. This grandeur of title which he earned was perhaps for the massive resistance he offered to the peril of Umayyad Caliph from the west (htt14).

It was somewhere in the range of AD 680-683 that Rutbil split from his brother the Shahi of Kābul, and established the Zunbil dynasty, paying temporary allegiance to Salm ibn Ziyad, the Arab governor of Sistan (Al-Tabari, 2015) (Rehman, 2006). And the area of Zabulistan came to be ruled by Rutbil, also spelled Zibil or Jibul (from Turkic: Iltäbär "Commander") (Ahmad Hasan Dani, 1996). Although the history hints that the two brothers were not at good terms but fought together against the Arabic Invasions (htt15).