Rubtil issued coins derived from Sassanian prototypes with very interesting look and feel. They had a Bactrian script legend on the obverse, a Pahlavi script legend on the reverse, and a short Brahmi script legend in the name of Śrī Vākhudevaḥ (Shri Vasudeva):

> Obverse: yypwlh. wtyp' / GDH / 'pzwt
> PWN ŠMY yzt' yypwl bgyh. wtyp' wh. m'n'n mlt'n MLK'
> King Jibul, [his] glory increased! In the name of god, Jibul, the Majestic Lord [is] King of brave men
> Reverse: Śrī Vākhudevaḥ / pncdh. z'wlst'n / 'pl plm'n yzd'n
> Shri Vasudeva / [minted in his] 15th [regnal year in] Zavulistan, by the order of the gods.
> —Coin legend of Rutbil (Ahmad Hasan Dani, 1996)

According to the analysis of Anthony McNicoll, the Zunbils ruled in the Kandahar area for nearly two and a half centuries until the late ninth century AD (Anthony McNicoll, 1996). His main capital Zamindawar was in the present-day Helmand Province of Afghanistan. The shrine of Zoon (the one destroyed by the Samura) was located about three miles south of Musa Qala in Helmand and the same can be traced even today. According to a few scholars the Sunagir temple mentioned by the Chinese traveller Xuan Zang in AD 640 is this very house of worship (Habibi).

The Umayyad governor of Sijistan and military commander, Ubayd Allah ibn Abi Bakra, led an Army of Destruction against the Zunbils in AD 698. But this campaign felt heavy on the Islamic Caliphate. He was defeated badly and was forced to bend offer a large tribute, give hostages including three of his sons, and take an oath not to invade the territory of the Zunbils ever. But the Muslim force was not ready to bend. It had been only two years to the big defeat of Ubayad Allah. In AD 700Al-Hajjaj ibn Yusuf appointed Ibn al-Ash'ath as commander of a huge Iraqi army which was also known as "Peacock Army," to avenge from formidable Zabulistan. But here again the character of Caliph Hajjaj backfired. His overbearing made Ibn al-Ash'ath and the "Peacock Army" to rebel. Latter got an agreement with the Zunbils and the peacocks began to march back to Iraq. And it was during this retreat that mutiny against al-Hajjaj formally shaped into an anti-Umayyad rebellion (Kennedy, 2010).

But the Arab world was no less than tail of a dog, not ready to be straight. The Arabs continually kept claiming the nominal overlordship over the Zunbils. And eleven years after the retreat of al-Ash'ath, in AD 711 Qutayba ibn Muslim managed to force Zunbils to pay tribute. But the situation flipped back again. In AD 725-726, Yazid ibn al-Ghurayf, governor of Sistan failed to gain the tribute from Zunbils. The next time they would be able to extract tribute from the Zunbils only in AD 769, when Ma'n b. Za'ida al-Shaybanl