Chapter 17: Babur in Tashkent (July AD 1502 AD–June AD 1503)

1 Passwords were of two kinds—in each tribe there is one for use in the tribe, such as Darwāna or Tūqqāī or Lūlū; (Darwāna [a trapdoor in a roof] has the variant dur-dāna, a single pearl; tūqqāī perhaps implies relationship; lūlū is a pearl, a wild cow etc.) and there is one for the use of the whole army. For a battle, two words are settled on as passwords so that of two men meeting in the fight, one may give the one, the other give back the second, to distinguish friends from foes, own men from strangers.

2 The gosha-gīr is an implement for remedying the warp of a bow-tip and string-notch.
