After the feast was over, following the tradition of Timur Beg, he gifted Andijān to Umar Shaikh. Similarly, Timur had gifted Ferghana to his son Umar Shaikh Mīrzā (elder) as a gift on the circumcision ceremony. Umar Shaikh Mīrzā went to Ferghana with his assigned guardian Khudai-Birdi Tughchi.

Details of Umar Shaikh

Umar was short and stout. He sported a round beard on a choppy face. His dressing sense was a bit peculiar, and he wore an absurdly tight tunic.

Babur has humorously elaborated on it: 'He (Umar) used to wear his tunic so very tight that to fasten the strings he had to draw his belly in and, if he let himself out after tying them, they often tore away.'[†]

Unlike the regular four-fold (char-pech) style, he used to tie his turban in the single fold (dastar-pech). When not in court or the temperature around was not so hot, he would wear a simple Moghūl Cap. From a general contemporary point of view, Umar wasn't too fond of good food and dressings.

Umar had got religious traits from his father Abu Sai'd. Abu was a determined Hanafi Mazhabi and followed the same as religiously as possible. He never missed his five-time prayers and read the Holy Qur'an very frequently. Even though the Islamic code allowed him to avoid prayers and fasting during wartime, he made no exception. He volunteered to be a disciple of Khwaja Ahrar.[3]

Nassiruddin Ubaidullah Ahrar, popularly known as Khwaja Ahrar was a Hanafi Maturidi member of the Golden Chain of the Naqshbandi Sufi order in Central Asia.[*] He was born in Samarkand, Uzbekistan in AD 1404 to a religious and devout Muslim family.[†] Khwaja Mehmood Shashi bin Khwaja Shihabuddin was his father. The traditions say that Ahrar's forefathers had migrated from Baghdad and his lineage connected to Abu Bakr Siddique from his paternal side and Umar Farooq from the maternal side.[‡]

Khwaja's father was a farmer and a Hajji following the footsteps of his father Shahabuddin Shahsi. Shahabuddin had good agricultural trade. His maternal grandfather Khwaja Daud was the son of a well-known Sufi Mystic Khwaja Khawand. Khawand was the son of Umar Baghistani, a famous shaikh who was honoured by Bahauddin Naqshband.[§]

As per the local folklore of Tashkent, various miracles occurred in Ahrar's life right from his birth. Ahrar's initial studies happened in Tashkent itself under the guidance of his uncle Ibrahim Shashi.[¶] In AD 1425, when he had turned twenty-one, Ibrahim took him to Samarkand for further studies. Somehow, his
