Yunus Khān and Esen Buqa II were sons of Vais Khān. Yunus' mother was either a daughter or granddaughter of Shaikh Nuru'd-din Beg, a Turkistani Kipchaq[9] [10] supported by Timur Beg. Unprecedented things happened after the demise of Vais Khān. The Moghūls were split into two camps. A smaller share remained for Yunus while the larger one went to Esen. Yunus had substantial support from the Biran and Chiras tribes. Airazan, a Barin Tumen Beg and Beg Mirik Turkman, a Chiras Tumen Beg came with Yunus Khān. They took around 4000 Moghūl house heads to Ulugh Beg, who had taken away Yunus' elder sister for his son 'Abd al-'Aziz. Ulugh Beg did not behave soundly with them—they were imprisoned. This phase had an important impact on Moghūl history.

Yunus Khān moved towards Iraq and stayed in Tabriz for a year. After a year, he went to Shiraz in the initial days of AD 1435 or the last days of AD 1434, where lived Shah Rukh,[11] [12] the second son of Sulṭān Ibrahim. It was only five or six months after Yunus' visit that Ibrahim died on AD 3 May of AD 1435, at the young age of forty. Ibrahim's son Abdullah Mīrzā was crowned as the new ruler of Shiraz. Yunus Khān did not miss the opportunity, and he began to mend his relationship with Abdullah Mīrzā. Yunus Khān became his retainer and paid respect as per protocol regularly.

Yunus Khān lived there for around seventeen to eighteen years. It was a period of turbulence between Ulugh Beg and his sons. Esen Buqa saw it as an opportunity and invaded Ferghana. In Babur's own words, Esen Buqa went on plundering the lands as far as Kand-i-Badam. He had not left even the prosperous Andijān and had captured every person in the city.

Sulṭān Abu Sa'id Mīrzā had already seized the throne of Samarkand and led an army beyond Taraz (Yany) to Aspara in Moghūlistan. Esen Buqa, Yunus' brother was beaten badly. Esen had to undo the further disasters and he decided to take Yunus' elder sister as his wife, who was formally the wife of 'Abd al-'Aziz.
