Haidar started to live a life of a staunch Muslim. Babur has praised Haidar extensively in Baburnama. Babur has said that he had mastered calligraphy, painting and arrow making, along with barb and string-grip makings. He had also developed into a mature poet and his writing skills reflected it quite clearly. Even the petitions he wrote to Babur were of a poetic quality.

Shah Begum was the Queen consort of Moghūlistan as the second wife of Yunus Khān. Although Yunus Khān had many women, only Shah Begum and Aisan Daulat Begum became mothers of his children. Shah Begum was one of the six daughters of Shah Sulṭān Muhammad, the Shah of Badakhshan. It is said that he was a descendant of Alexander the Great. Sulṭān Abu Sa'id Mīrzā took one of the other daughters of Sulṭān Muhammad. Her name was Shahzada Begum, and she gave birth to Aba Bikr Mīrzā.

Yunus Khān had two sons and two daughters with Shah Begum. The firstborn son, Sulṭān Mahmud Khān, was younger than all Asian Daulat Begum's daughters. He was initially called Khānika Khān in and around Samarkand. Next to Mahmud was Sulṭān Ahmad Khān who was popularly known as Alacha Khān. As per local traditions, he was called so because he killed many Qalmaqs on various occasions he met them in battles. In Moghūl and Qalmaq tongue, one who kills was called 'Alachi', but with time, his name became 'Alacha'. Both Mahmud and Ahmad find quite a significant place in the history of Moghūls.

Sulṭān Nigar Khānim, the youngest daughter of Yunus Khān, was given to Sulṭān Mahmud Mīrzā. She gave birth to one child from Mahmud who was named Wais Mīrzā but was popularly known as Mīrzā Khān. He crafted his place well in the Tīmūrid history. With the death of Sulṭān Mahmud Mīrzā in AD 1495, Nigar took Wais to her brothers who were then located in Tashkent.
