Khurāsān and quickly seized control. He also took control of Mashhad and Herat in AD 1449. Ala al-Dawla Mīrzā occasionally raided the region but only to a minimal effect. Together with Ulugh Beg and Sulṭān Muhammad (who gained control of central Persia), Babur became one of the three important Tīmūrid rulers.

But misfortune was waiting for him. The beautiful balance of power was soon unsettled by Sulṭān Muhammad as soon as he invaded Khurāsān. Interestingly, the first campaign of AD 1450 started badly for Babur with a defeat at Mashhad. It convinced him to cede parts of his territory. However, the mighty and brave Babur soon recovered. He took Sulṭān Muhammad prisoner and executed him. He then marched to Shiraz to take control of Sul ṭān Muhammad's lands.

At this point, Jahan Shah of the Black Sheep Turkmen ended his loyalty to the Tīmūrids quickly putting Qum and Saveh under siege. Babur began to march against him but was forced to return to Herat, due to the overwhelming superiority of the Black Sheep's armies and a plot hatched against him by Ala al-Dawla Mīrzā. Most of Persia was taken from the Tīmūrids by AD 1452, except for Abarquh, which was conquered by the Black Sheep in AD 1453. While Kirman was temporarily conquered sometime later and a few attempts were made to seize Ray, Persia was never retaken by the Tīmūrids.

In AD 1454, Babur invaded Transoxiana, which was then under the control of Abu Sa'id Mīrzā in retaliation for the latter's seizure of Balkh. He quickly laid siege to Samarkand. However, the conflict between the two soon ended with an agreement to declare the Oxus River as the border. The agreement remained in effect until Babur died in AD 1457. He would be soon succeeded by his son Mahmud.[*]

According to Babur, he was mean but good-tempered, smart, brave and active man, along with being an exceptional archer. He was fond of playing polo and performed well in leapfrog. He controlled Babur's Gate post the unfortunate and tragic demise of Umar Shaikh Mīrzā.
