Gate after the departure of Hasan Yaqub Beg. Throughout his life as Babur's Amit, his authority kept shining more and more. The stories of his bravery spread for miles. There is a story about him beating Aūzbegs thoroughly. It was in the summers of AD 1499 near Kasan when he overtook the Aūzbegs and butchered them. This happened in front of Umar Shaikh. In AD 1501, he had gone to be with Khusrau Shah in Babur's guerrilla days. That was the period when Babur was on the verge of migrating from the land of Macha Hill to the region of Sultān Mahmud Khān. But Qasim Beg Quchin returned to Babur in AD 1504, boosting the former's courage. Babur welcomed him back with abundant affection and respect.

Just a year after Qasim's return, Babur attacked the Turkman Hazara raiders in Dara-i-Khwush. Qasim's presence made a great difference. Babur has mentioned that despite Qasim being in his silver years, he made better advances than many younger men in the fleet. Happy Babur rewarded him with the Bangash district[1] for his acute courage after returning from Kābul. By AD 1522, Babur took hold of Zamindawar.[2] By then, Qasim had devoted himself to the service of Allah completely. Babur describes him as Allah-fearing, a very pious 'Musalman' and, an abstainer from doubtful activities. It is said that he was an excellent judge and counsel, with a facetious attitude. He was illiterate, but his sense of humour was par excellence.

The region Zamindawar had served as the headquarters to the Durrani Pashtun tribe of the Alizai. The region had also turned into home to Nurzai, Barakzai and Alakozai tribes, besides Durrani and Kuchis tribes. The people of Zamindawar happened to become the strength of Ghazi Mohammad Ayub Khān[3] when he besieged Kandahar. Three centuries later, a Zamindawar contingent of tribesmen almost defeated Sir Donald Stewart's force at the Battle of Ahmed Khel (fought on 19 April 1880).[4] [*] Stewart was the lieutenant general of the British Indian Army during the Second Anglo-Afghan War. On 27 March 1880, Lieutenant General Stewart led a force of 7200 in a march from Kandahar to Kābul to reinforce the forces of General Roberts. General Roberts was the British commander in the Afghan capital of Kābul. It is said that the march ended up being an uphill one as the deserted land of Afghans was continuously shadowed by the local tribesmen.[†] The control of Zamindawar was regarded by the British-Indian
