Aūrā-tīpā with him. He was defeated and slain. Records say that his management skills were excellent, and he had a particularly good relationship with men who worked with him. It is also observed that he wasn't a pious Muslim—he neither offered prayers nor kept the Ramzan fasts. He can be considered a heathen. The story tells that when it came to being against the opponents, he was quite a tyrant.

Ali Dost Taghai was another well-known Amir. He was a Sagharichi Tuman Beg. Perhaps, he was a cousin of Babur's maternal grandmother, Aisan-Daulat Begum. Babur favoured him way more than Umar Shaikh Mīrzā had done, although Babur has also been quite critical of him on certain occasions. He goes on to say that no work came from him though people always praised him for being a person of work. He is said to have served Sulṭān Abu Sa'id Mīrzā. He claimed to have the power to bring on rain with the jadestone. Babur frowned and said, 'He was the Falconer, worthless by nature and habit, a stingy, severe, strife-stirring person, false, self-pleasing, rough of tongue and cold-of-face.'

Wais Laghari was another Amir, who came from the lineage of the Samarkand Tughchi people. He served mostly with Umar Shaikh Mīrzā and accompanied Babur on his guerilla excursions. Although he was known for his judgement and counsel skills, he was highly sectarian.

A brother of Ali Dost Taghai's too served as the Amir to the Mīrzās. His name was Mir Ghiyas Taghai and younger brother of Ali. None other than him was as aggressive in front of Sulṭān Abu Sa'id Mīrzā's Gate. He was in charge of the Mīrzā's square seal and was a close confidant. He was also a close friend of Wais Laghari. It was in AD 1494 that Kasan went to the hands of Sulṭān Mahmud Khān and then Mir Ghiyas became his support. He gained high favour from Mahmud Khān. It is said that he was one of the jolliest of all the Amirs and quite sporting when it came to challenges.

Ali-darwesh Khurasani was another important Amir of the family. He had served in the Khurasan cadet corps—one of two special troops of serviceable young men formed by Sulṭān Abu Sa'id Mīrzā. It occurred in the days when he first began to arrange the government of Khurasan and Samarkand. Naturally, the second troop was called the Samarkand Corps. Ali-Darwesh was a man of valour and courage. Babur was a witness of his character of Bravery at the Gate of Bishkaran in AD 1500 during its
