Sulṭān. Hasan, the son of Yaqub was sent to meet Darwesh Muhammad Tarkhān who came from the side of Sulṭān Ahmad. Latter is known to be a distant uncle of Babur's mother and had long been loyal to Ahmad Mīrzā. The meeting occurred in a Namagah, a few miles away from Andijān. The discussions went well, and peace was made, following which Sulṭān Ahmad's forces retired.

But Babur's problems were not going to end soon. Sulṭān Mahmud Khān had begun to march along the north of Khujand and finally laid the siege of Akhsi.

Jahangir Mīrzā controlled Akhsi. He was being assisted by Ali Darwesh Beg, Mīrzā Quli Kukuldash and Muhammad Baqir Beg. His gate was being guarded by Shaikh Abdu'llah. Jahangir also had the company of a few big names like Wais Lagdhari and Mir Ghiyas Taghai. But the fear of Akhsi begs made them retreat. They went back to the Wais' Kasan district.[3] Here, Wais became guardian to Nasir Mīrzā[4] who was already staying there.

But the tide changed again as Sulṭān Mahmud Khān came nearer to Akhsi. The conspiracy to capture the power of Ferghana began to take shape. Mir Ghiyas joined Mahmud's service. Wais Lagdhari cunningly took Nasir Mīrzā to Sulṭān Ahmad Mīrzā, who entrusted him (Nasir) to Muhammad Mazid Tarkhān. Mazid was a close aide of his and the governor of Turkistan.

Finally, Sulṭān Mahmud Khān got a blue nose at the hands of Akhsi begs. They fought their lives out to keep the land safe from him. He had returned to Tashkent.

Babur had another big threat from the neighbourhood—from Mīrzā Abu Bakr Dughlat.

Mīrzā Abu Bakr Dughlat was an Amir of the Dughlat tribe, who ruled in the south-western part of the present Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region of China till his death in AD 1514.[*] In AD 1465, he founded a kingdom in the Western Kashgaria at Yarkand. Yarkand was a fragment of Moghūlistan which included Khotan and Kashgar. He had annexed Kashgar in AD 1480.[†] He was grandson of Amir Sayyid Ali and son of Saniz Mīrzā. Sayyid Ali was the Amir in Kashgar and had regained control of the city by Dughlat dynasty after having expelled the Tīmūrid local ruler in AD 1435.

Abu Bakr's father and grandfather had been loyal to Yunus Khān. But Abu Bakr rebelled against him in AD 1479–80. Yunus Khān's son Ahmad Alaq took away Kashghar from him in AD 1499 but failed to hold it for long. After regaining Kashghar, Abu Bakr took his forces and began campaigning to
