In January of AD 1495, Sulṭān Mahmud Mīrzā succumbed to a six-day violent illness at the age of forty-three. His Amir, Khusrau Shah unsuccessfully tried to conceal the the death to lay his hand on Mīrzā's deep treasure. It was naïve of him to assume that the news could be concealed. It spread through the town like a wildfire. The people of Samarkand were more than delighted to have received the news. Then came the phase when the populace rose in tumult against Khusrau Shah. But Ahmad Haji Beg and the Tarkhāni begs somehow succeeded in mitigating the uprising, which might have led to Khusrau's lynching. They ensured to get Khusrau a way out to Ḥiṣār safely with an escort.

Sulṭān Mahmud had given Ḥiṣār and Bukhara to Sulṭān Masud Mīrzā and Baysonghor Sulṭān Mīrzā, respectively. But, just before his death, he had dismissed both governments and hence, neither of the two were present at the places in that moment.

After having arranged Khusrau's escape to Hisar, the begs mutually agreed to call Baysonghor Sulṭān Mīrzā to Samarkand from Bukhara to have him seated on the throne. He was just eighteen years old when he took the title of Padshah of Samarkand.

The country was going through a deep crisis. Sulṭān Mahmud Khān (Chaghatai) was persuaded by Junaid Barlas and other notable people from Samarkand to capture the town of Kan-Bai. The persuaded Mahmud Khān took his army and marched near the town. Hearing the news, Baysonghor Sulṭān Mīrzā marched out with his warriors to counter Mahmud. A massive fight took place near Kan-Bai. The Moghūl Army was led by Haidar Kukuldash. He and his fabulous soldiers were rained arrows on the opponents. But soon came the warriors of Ḥiṣār and Samarkand. Their ravishing attack brought all the Moghūls under their horses' feet. Haidar was made captive which led to the remaining Moghūl soldiers retreat. Baysonghor was brutal to the survivors. They were beheaded mercilessly in front of his eyes. It is said that his tent had to move three times as the pile of beheaded bodies kept growing.

While the political crisis was on, Ibrahim Saru appeared again. He was once dismissed by Abu Sa'id Mīrzā. He entered the fort of Asfara where Khutbah now read Baysonghor's name, and he was there to stand with him against Babur.

In May, Babur's army marched to crush this rebellion. Qasim, the lord of Babur's Gate, took charge and rammed in with his sharp sword along with Sulṭān Ahmad Tambal and Muhamamd Dost Taghai. Qasim kept marching, killing
